

Training gives way to contact

The telephone rings and when you answer, the person on the line tells you he is going to commit suicide.

Not many people would know how to respond in such a situation but a group of trained volunteers not only know how, they've had experience. Those volunteers are the voices which reach out to people in crisis through the North Halton Contact Centre crisis line.

"The more volunteers the better it is," said Pat Wood of the service.

A series of training sessions for crisis line volunteers begins Tues. May 1 at 7.30 p.m. and continues for three consecutive Tuesdays. The final session will take in an entire Saturday.

"We teach how to handle calls and develop a relationship with the caller," explained Contact Centre volunteer Mrs. Wood.

One of the functions of a volunteer is to inform callers of services in the community which might be able to assist them.

Through training, volunteers learn the importance of developing a rapport with callers.

Representatives from various community groups will describe services offered during the day-long session. The North Halton Contact Centre has contact information available for more than 1,000 services.

Prospective volunteers can expect to donate 12 hours each month, usually split into four-hour shifts.

Anyone interested in attending the training session and would like further details about the service should call 877-1211.

HRCA gave Katimavik participants a goodbye party Friday at Hilton Falls conservation area. Gwen Kainola (right) is the group leader who is starting a new Katimavik project in Milton and is turning over the existing one to Laurice Lovemore (left). The new participants arrive in May.

Katimavik does double duty here

There will be a brief lull in the Katimavik project operated in Milton but things will soon pick up in double force.

A group of 11 Katimavik participants, representing the final three month rotation here will leave today (Wednesday) with a replacement group arriving Wed. May 16.

The Katimavik participants have done a lot of work on a volunteer basis for Halton Region Conservation Authority (HRCA) and at Halton Centennial Manor. The replacements will be under the guidance of group leader Laurice Lovemore.

She is taking over this particular project from Gwen Kainola who has developed a new project in Milton. Beginning June 26, a second Katimavik group in town will specifically benefit residents at the Manor and students of E.C. Drury School for Hearing Impaired.

The need for the volunteer assistance of participants at those institutions made them a natural focus for Katimavik. The nature of the volunteers' work makes it necessary for the participants to live close to the Manor and E.C. Drury.

Suitable housing for Milton's second project has not yet been found. Gwen is looking for a four or five bedroom house to be rented for the use of a group of 12 young people. The Katimavik project will operate for nine months and involve three groups through three different rotations.

Anyone who can offer urban rental accommodation for Katimavik participants or is in need of the volunteer services of participants should call 878-7160.
