

CN's first plan for intermodal terminal in Milton came forward in 2001

“I don't need them right below a residential subdivision, right below an education village, with no direct access to roads,” she said. CN's intermodal plans have a long history in Milton, first coming forward in 2001. At that time the company was met with intense opposition from local residents, with then-Halton MP Gary Carr delivering a 6,000-name petition to Parliament Hill. Another petition is in the works this time around and can be found at www.miltonsay-sno.com and www.miltonrail.com.

In 2008, CN decided to call off its plans, but still continued to own 1,000 acres of land in south Milton.

The current proposal for a 400-acre intermodal is part of this larger plot of land, which has some residents concerned about the possibility of future expansion.

CN has opened up a project information centre at 61 James Snow Pkwy. for residents to visit and speak with company staff.

The centre is open on Saturdays from 9 a.m. to 2 p.m.
