Police to address new street check regulations

NEWS

By Tim Whitnell METROLAND WEST MEDIA GROUP

Strict regulations regarding the practice of street checks by police in Ontario will be addressed soon by Halton Regional Police.

Halton Deputy Chief Nishan Duraiappah said a public report to be presented at the Halton police services board this month will address new Ontario regulations related to street checks, also known as carding. Carding, or street checks, is the random or arbitrary stopping of a person by police and asking for their identification and other information. Duraiappah said the intent is for Halton officers' actions to be consistent with those of other police services.

Local Police Chief Stephen Tanner said Halton hasn't practised carding for about 18 months; he said that instead officers put out suspicious persons reports.

The chief said that if any officer is filing reports on a suspect or someone from the public based on, for example, their age and/or ethnicity, it "would not be appropriate and we wouldn't do that."

New regulations for police are being phased in this year.
