

Quick tips for heating and cooling your home without bulky units

If you're renovating, building an addition or doing a new house construction, you may soon find that heating and cooling the rooms is a major consideration. Central air units can be bulky and costly but there is an alternative: a ductless system. This is ideal for homes or offices since it can replace noisy and unsightly window units – and it is also a favoured solution for renovations or retro-fits where it's important to preserve the building's original appearance.

Ductless systems are a smart choice in other ways as well. They are quiet, customizable, easy to install and they are energy efficient. If you are unfamiliar with this option, here's the scoop:

Easy Installation: There are three basic parts including an outdoor heating/cooling unit, an indoor unit to deliver the conditioned air, and compact refrigerant lines that run between the two units. Ductless systems are available in different sizes, including some that can heat and cool multiple rooms with a single outdoor unit. Installation is also more economical eliminating the need for costly duct work.

High Energy Efficiency: You can cut heating and cooling bills with LG's energy-efficient inverter technology, with most models being Energy Star qualified. These ductless units feature heating mode efficiency as much as 3.9 times the efficiency of electric heaters, a 75 per cent reduction in electrical consumption. Heating and cooling can be concentrated in a single room or area, rather than changing temperature throughout the whole house.

Customization: With seven indoor unit styles and 21 individual models, LG says its Multi F ductless systems are customizable by unit style or capacity to fit the occupant's needs for décor and heating/cooling requirements. The indoor units also come in different sizes and colour to suit any décor, including the Art Cool Gallery and Art Cool Mirror designs.
