

Free mobile application available for download on Android, Apple devices for individuals with special cognitive needs, their parents, siblings and teachers. The app is the brainchild of Nadia Hamilton, founder and CEO of Magnusmode. The former Scarborough resident, who moved to Kitchener two years ago to launch her company, said she was inspired to create the app by her 27-year-old brother, Troy, who is autistic. "How do we prepare Troy, and others like him, for a life of independence and inclusion," Hamilton asked, adding that the card decks are "a constant friend and guide" that are easy to use. They can be downloaded on any android or Apple device, including an iPad or iPhone, and are also available online. An interactive character named Magnus and points awarded for various completed tasks make the app fun to use.

The cards are helpful not only for people with autism, but also for those with ADHD and Aspergers. Hamilton acknowledged there is "a learning curve" on how to use the card decks, but caregivers, parents and teachers can easily provide the necessary instruction.

Magnusmode provides quarterly reports to its community partners on how many people have downloaded the app and how many have viewed it. While it is still too early to gauge the activity on the app for the MPL, interest has been high as evidenced by a good turnout of caregivers and parents at the program's recent launch at MPL.

"We are happy to have had the opportunity to contribute to this app and expand our services to the Milton community," O'Sullivan said.
