ose that an ardent and imaginative mind would avail itself of many expressions which might seem to convey other sentiments than those of mere admiration. While there are many of these somets which are far too arti ficial, and evidently elaborated with much toil, there are also many which from being autobiographical, cannot fail to be attractive. Each external object in nature seems to suggest to him some corresponding state of his own mind; and, according to his mood, he could detect in all around him traces of glad ness or grief. When we take it up we seem to have retired, as it were from the glare of the sun into some dense and cooling forest; but between the branches of the overarching trees the sunshine still streams in; and thus, though Sir Philip Sid remote age, the glare and glitter of the world still occasionally dazzle us. If we read of the quietude of the country, of still waters, and soothing breezes, there suddenly flashes fore us some bright tournament of joust .-The hero of chivalry and the country awain are very near together. All the characters are noble and good; in none is there anything ordinary, anything mean. Imagination thus becomes the handmaid of virtue. Its glades are somewhat like those of Versailles. The very grandeur of the avenues indicates the neighborhood of the palace of a Great King. We catch the sound of rushing waters, but is it not the falling melody of the "Grandes Eaux?"
