That night, by Powis's orders, all lights were put out in the ship at a very early hour. He wished to give the slaver, if such the phantom ship was, a notion that loose watch was kept on board the Spitfire.

The whole night, with only now and then short rest in the cabin, the boy-captain remained himself in the cross-trees, as vigilant as a deer-stalker. Gasket was by his side, equally intent on the harbor mouth.

All of a sudden Gasket felt his arm clutchand he looked round. For one moment a little tongue of fire risen from the apex of the look-out hill, the
