We hear of fortunes made in a day, but forget to enquire about the offset in the number which have been lost, and the misery and unhappiness which have fallen to the lot of the many. An almost universal greed of speculation begins to govern the opinions and habits of society. Without reference to the the appointment of Alexander Workman, Esq., The Darmstadt army had been placed on a questions of nappiness, health and usefulness, men begin to enquire about the most profitable governments of those countries in arriving at business at which they can place their sons. The farming business, which is generally a life of calm contentment, and with proper habits of industry always attended with success, appears to be losing its attractions, even to those whose parents have spent their lives in agricultural pursuits. They hear of great fortunes made by the merchants, and are anxious to join in the rush of a crowded city. But they should remember the odds which are against success.
