At the demonstration in the county of Welland in the fall of 1862, at which Mr. Howland was present, he delivered himself his own views regarding Canada and its union with the Lower Provinces.

He looked hopefully forward to the time when this great Province of Canada would be connected with the Provinces below, and when a man would feel that to be a British American was to be a citizen of a country which included all these fertile lands, all these boundless resources, all these boundless resources, all these boundless resources.

At the first question which we men of the North must put to ourselves is, have we a territory broad enough of which to make a nation? At the risk of travelling over some of the greatest treasuries of the world, we have a territory for Annapolis, that it can be shown that we have.
