O'er-crept and nestled to the weary earth. The moonbeams stole to kiss her loveliness, And blent their mellow splendor with the dark, To beautify the shadows of the world. And then, the unchanging galaxies of heaven Flashed out eternal rays, to stamp the Night With glery and immutability.
Then flew with lightning wing, through quickened Two messengers from Heaven, clad alike In purity and calm ineffable.

SLEEP AND DEATH.

BY ISIDORE G. ASCHIER, OF MONTREAL.

The splendid vesture of the gentle Night Clung to the skirts of both; a crown of stars Circled the head of one, whose beauty seemed Diviger than her sister's: soon they touched The summit of an undulating hill, Bordering the noisy haunts of busy men; And the red moon, showering yellow flames, Illumed the clumps of furze and trailing weeds To seeming asphodels and amaranths !

With arms enfolded tenderly o'er each, As if a subtle sympathy of love Had knit their souls, they hushed their dreamy Then Sleep, beneficent, scattered abroad Th' invisible seeds of slumber, taking root

Within the jaded hearts of human kind, To blossom into gossamer flowers of dreams, Casting a fragrance through the resting brain Lightly and fleetly in an aerial maze. And querulous Youth, and sighing Maidenhood, Lay smiling in the beauty of repose; And Heaven-born Peace, unconscious of her power, Through shadowy chambers entered noiselessly, And dimpled Innocence with Mveliness, Had flung a chastening calm and tender smile On faces harsh with cankering toil and care; Then Sleep, enraptured at her marvellous work. Like one accused of kindness, who might droop A lowly glance, unwilling to be praised, In bright contentment gazed upon the earth. Upon the happy dwellings wrapt in calm.
And gave her sister Death this utterance:

What song exultant can be praise to God For choosing me to lavish good on man? When Night, stamping her boliness on earth, Flies at the tender touch of warbling Dawn, Men clasp my memory and bless my name ; What truer recomponse can angels know Than homage of a prayer and grateful love?"

Then Death—a quiet sailness in her tenes. A tender melancholy in her smile, Her starry eyes suffused with starry tears, Such as immortals weep—gave answer thus: "If easting forth the lieavenly balm of good, The American Brig Nubia was boarded by Is even angels' highest privilege, pirates on the coast of China; no date given. O would that I might earn a grateful prayer! And earning gratitude of lasting love, . Ald, Traversy presented the petition of Dr. | The Captain and two men were killed and sev- Alas! men hate me in their restless fear, For I am in their thought an enemy. A truel, vengeful bitter enemy.

> Then Sieep replied "What boots it that men fear. Not knowing what they fear, as children dread The ominous darkness of a lonely room, Or palsied Age may leathe to sear the past, The ruinous chasm of the buried years, Filled with a wasting heap of cankering hopes, Defeated plans and baffled aims of youth, Not deeming Endless Wisdom shattered them. We both are peaceful messengers from God; Thy touch may hush, like mine, the sorrowing soul And banish evermore the groans of pain: The peace I breathe is but a fleeting calm, But thine is like the eternal calm of stars! My love a boon for earth, but thine for Heaven! The dead Day summons me to heal men's griefs, The pallid Dawn enfolds me in her arms, And the world wakes to cares of yesterday; But thy far-reaching endless love, like His, Which finite wisdom never wholly grasps, Casts infinite peace upon the soul of man, Who wakes to bless thee in Eternity!"

The angel ceased, and Death in speechless joy Drooped on the arm of Sleep, and perfect calm, Shedding a blissful tanetity o'er each, Likens the angels to our mortal eyes! From Colburn's Monthly for August.
