When they entered Nelson Monk was on the logs; he had a gun in his hands; Francis Phelan was near, and had a picket, and so had Mr. Barry; saw Nelson Monk strike at John McMartin with the butt of his gun which he wielded over the eyes, who was standing seven or eight feet within the mill door; he was knocked down; l heard a shot just as he fell; the shot was from any one, but he fired to the outside; Alexander McMartin had come up a minute before, and attempted to come in; some words passed between him and the parties, in the mill forbidding his entering, but he persevered uning, and rested against a post; the door was down at the time; it was broken in the middle, and I think it all fell : Perriere was there : Barry more than once, and one of the blows was a heavy blow ; did not see Mr. Barry strike back, but saw Biron come to his aid; when Alexander McMartin fell the people went away : saw Phelan advance with a stick to strike John McMartin, but Nelson Monk jumped forward and caught his arm, and told him he was liurt; McMartin then went out; saw John McMartin strip off his cost, and throw it on the ground. When Nelson Monk's Nan. McMartin was below him at the door on slide, on a level with the floor; Monk did not bring they gun to his shoulder; it was low down in a slung position as if lowered to the John McMartin went to try to take place in the mill, and took friends with him : thought there might be a little scuffle for it, but we would get in ; we all went to the mill ; Henry Larocque and Michon accompanied me to the east door; the others remained behind ing there, and told him I was come to take my place at the works ; he said if I advanced a step further he would shoot me : Perriere and Larocque were behind me; the latter drew me back by the arm; I thought there was nothing in the guns, and I said to Larocque, let us try the other door, we can't get in here we went to it, pulled at it, and got it partly open, and I and Perierre got in; I received a blow across my face, but could not say from whom; was knocked down and stunned; knew nothing after that until taken to my brother's.
