

pist leg it attacked his Protestant body (daughter), and this Mayor of Derry was in due time gathered to his city's fathers (rested in peace). The political career of this other martyred example was not one to be followed, and he would draw an illustration from another quarter of the Island to show the advantage of an opposite line of conduct. On one occasion, a Minister passing having met his young master who just returned from his travels, told him he had married King for her. (Musing, here following.) "Why," said his Master, "men generally select their wives in their faces—how did you come to take King for her look?" Said the peasant. "Well, you know, I said that at a tilt of mine, and she said, 'I have had a chance at all, but now by putting my hand to King's back together we have one of the best looks in the country' (great laughter). This was what (Master) desired to see the Protestant Irish, and the Catholic Irish do in all matters of common interest. The English, however, are very different. When the Irish Protestant Benevolent Society had its meeting in January last it was largely patronized by their Roman Catholic fellow citizens; and when the next night the Catholics had their Orphan's benefit, the Protestants in turn were prompt to show that their sympathy was with them. The English agree that religion did not require them to be enemies, they should have in this Dominion a very powerful link. Though he did not intend to speak of politics on this occasion, he hoped his hon. friend from Nova Scotia would not think him discourteous if he did, and said, "I am only too anxious to bring the Union harmoniously into existence in Ottawa. (Applause). They were not disposed to let a good thing slip them, and he was sure they would all agree in desiring that the Hon. Mr. Howe might long be an occupant of the House of Commons. The events of the past week which had transpired in this city had impressed him with a feeling of solemnity approaching to awe, which had struck deep into his heart. The assemblage here of the two hundred and fifty gentlemen in the Legation of our country was a most impressive assembly, for upon them depended much what would be the future of these Provinces. He would not compare our Legislature to a Roman Senate, or a British Parliament, or to any other Legislative body, but there they are, or rather here they are, for he has no doubt but that men of all parties and all creeds will be at the assemblies within the walls of the grand pile on Barrack Hill will bear examination, and not unfavorable contrast with any equal number of any similar body in the world. (Cloud Chorus). He had looked over the list of distinguished names in the Senate, and the House of Commons he could not recall the listing of now much more than two bodies of men had it in their power for good or for ill, to avert or to bring upon this country (applause). It is true those gentlemen who were not before familiar with the scene, would find that it extended on one side into the great hall, and on the other into the little lesson of the landscape would not be thrown away upon them if they thought that they had still a country to make, a new people to attack to a new soil, and a new national policy to formulate and familiarize with the people. (Applause). The performance of this duty was a task congenital in time, as the hill on which they met was signal from every point of approach, for they were assembled to take joint possession of a seventh part of the continent, in the joint names of their Constituents and their Sovereign. (Cheers). After referring to the performance of the duty which he understood had the reputation of being one of the best in the British service, and the ladies and gentlemen who had entertained them, Mr. McEve made a humorous allusion to his meeting with the great composer Verdi in Italy, and the opportunity he had of hearing him destroy the voices of so many young ladies in this Western world. (Laughter). His expression of what was called the modern style of musical composition was akin to the Scotchwoman's appreciation of a fine sermon. When asked if he understood it, she replied—"A well! it was a fine sermon, but God forgive me if I don't understand it." (Laughter). In insist the Irish had something in common, something in which they ought to take a common pride, as well as a common pleasure, for there was no more in the plan of the Irish, than to be a Protectorate, and to be a Papal fiefdom, than a sort of sectarianism in the sweet sounds they had heard that night, whether from the instrumental performances of the band or that vocal and direct line of all instruments, the human voice (applause). Mr. McEve concluded his remarks by referring to the importance of a spirit of general toleration and good will among all classes of His Majesty's subjects, and hoping that next year not only he but many other gentlemen attracted to the capital by duties of a public nature, would occupy the platform to assist in forwarding the good work of the Society. (Cheers).

ETNA FIRE AND RELIANCE LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.—It will be seen by the advertisements of the Etna Fire, Dublin, Ireland, and the Reliance, Life, England, in our columns to-day, that Mr. Neil McKinnon has been appointed the agent of these companies for Ottawa. From Mr. McKinnon's knowledge of insurance matters, having already represented several Fire and Life Offices, we have no doubt a good selection has been made. The Montreal Herald thus speaks of the establishment of agencies in Canada by one of these companies:—

"The Insurance Company of Dublin in Ireland is called to the attention of the Province of Ontario, to the Etna Fire and Reliance Insurance Company." The absence hitherto in Canada of an Irish Company of the above kind, which should take its place beside the several Scottish, English, and kindred institutions already established, and apparently so numerous, in this country, the Directors of the Etna have long been fit to direct the interests of the Etna, have at length resolved to meet the deficiency, and have opened a branch of their Company in Montreal, and have placed the same under the direction of T. W. Griffith, Esq., whose name in insurance matters is as
