Professor Senate admirably fit him for conducting all Millers-who is also good authority on this these issues to a satisfactory conclusion. Our head -in answer to the question: " What readers will therefore feel that in the appointadvantage does the metrical system present ment and confirmation of Mr. Johnson the (English) system?" says: "The great advantage of having convenient units, and which is calculated to reflect honor on the system at present is, 1, 1, 1-5, 1-10; while the purely binary system is, 1, 1, 1, 1; and herefore may be easily assimilated so as to exactly correspond. And while we ask a slight change, on the part of the French nation, we cheerfully admit that the old English system of pounds, shillings and throughout the world. Even the American the adoption of the metrical system of weights. measures, and coins; adding that, "the changes required for converting the existing recoinage would be unnecessary." The same authority says :- " The fineness of both the gold and the silver coins in each of the above-mentioned systems is the same -namely, 0-10 of pure metal to 1-10 of alloy. The ratio of gold to silver assumed in each of the above cases is a sale one, being below the market and consequently rendering the silver coins of greater nominal value (expressed in gold values) than their actual market values. The relative market values of gold to silver for the past fourteen years has averaged 15 3-8 to 1. The 2nd case—that of the Metrical System-is obviously the most simple, as regards the relation of the weight of the coins to the metrical unit of weight-the gramme, -as also in relation to the relative market values of gold and silver. The 3rd case is the least simple of all." All things considered, we are of opinion that the Paris Conference's recommendations purely, will neither be adopted by Great Britain or the United States, and we further believe that something more metrical in form, will take the place of the present proposition not only at Washington, but also at London,
