THOTOGRAPHS.

ARTIFICIAL LIGHT Professor Schele de Vere gives a popular sketch, in Putnam's Monthly, for August, of the history of artificial light, from the first rude attempt to turn night into day by burning pine knots, to the elaborate scientific contrivances, of this century. The important inventions of wicks, candles and argrand chimneys marked each an era in the progress of knowledge; but the last few years, with the discovery of coal gas, and then of petroleum, have already made a revolution in lighting dwellings, while there is strong reason to hope for still greater triumphs of science as at hand which will almost drive darkness away, at least from large cities. The electric light and its applications are thus sketched by the writer: The electric spark was changed into a continuous ray, and thus a light was obtained which blinds the (unprotected eve at a distance of five hundred yards. Its. production, however, is difficult and expeas've, and little use would be made of t were it not that the electric light has already proved a great blessing-at sea. It would have added greatly to the methods which have been employed to make electricity used in illumination.

The whole problem of proexcited so much curiosity and hope some fifteen years ago, The cheap analysis of water has not yet been discovered. But every year makes some progress towards simplifying the production of oxygen in other ways; and it is now claimed that by processes recently perfected by two French chemists, Mallet and Tessie du Motay, it can be obtained from common air cheap enough to make the famous A Drummone light" available for commercial use. A gives a light of peculiar intensity, but pleasant to the eye and more powerful for photography than any other artificial light known. The results hitherto reached are interesting only for one promise they give, as it does not appear that a magnesium light has actually been made within the means of any private purse less ample than that of Napoleon III. But recent experiments in Paris are encouraging; and Professor Schele de Vere informs us that zercon, which glows without consuming in the flame, is a good substitute for magnesium which burns up rapidly, and this removes a large part of the expense. He concludes that "there is every reason to hope, therefore, that the present year will, in the material aspect of the question also, furnish a satisfactory answer to the daily increasing demand for more light,"
