ENGAGEMENTS. From the Saturday Review. A certain crabbled old parson at Oxford, who had grown hoary with the unprofitable service of getting Fourth Form Bionians and Harrovians through the different public examinations, used to say, in illustration of one of Aldrich's dark sayings, that the word "engagement" is always "an engagement" by a word of the second intention. When he would say, a man talks of making a breaking, forgetting, or keeping an engagement, no one can tell what sort of an engagement is meant, because men use the word in its first or general intention of a certain obligation by contract. But when a lady speaks of an engagement, she employs the word in its technical or secondary sense, and you may be quite certain that she means an agreement to marry. When Amanda tells Lucetta that she is "engaged," you have no more doubt of the precise significance of the word than you have when you see it printed on a notice in a newspaper.

THE BULL DOG. A resident in the Faubourg Poissonnerie in Paris, in a tenement which was separated from his neighbour's house only by a partition. He had remarked nothing peculiar in his neighbour's way of living until one day he was surprised to hear a very distinctly in his room performed the duties of a dog. He had heard of the dog and had seen it in the streets of his own country, but he had never seen it in a tenement house. He had never seen it in a tenement house.
