Dr. Edward Jarvis gives an interesting article in the Atlantic Monthly for October, on the gradual improvement which has taken place in the duration of human life. He brings together, in an outline, the results of the tables of mortality kept in all ages, ever since Ulpisnus, a Roman judge of the time of Alexander Severus, made the first attempt to compute the average "expectation of life."

It appears conclusively that sanitary science has a great influence for good; and that the greater attention paid to the conditions of life and health, in recent times, has told weightily in the statistics. In former ages, many forms of disease were more fatal, as well as more New Benrond, Mass., September 26.—Dr. C. prevalent, than now—especially those of chil-
