LOOK OUT, CHICAGO

It is possible that Chicago may have a characteristic sensation before long. A titled British malefactor is now "on the loose," and, as he has rendered England far too incondescent to contain him. and there are certain circumstances not wholly unconnected with his joyous career that might make his reception- in New York too boisterous to be pleasant, what could be more natural than that he should bend his pilgrim steps towards that heaven for all that is virtuous and domestic and connubially blissful-Chicago? Sir Eardley Culling Eardley, baronet, is the eminent example of the minor British aristocracy to whom we refer. The name if we mistake not, was once associated with Exeter Hall and the pious thunder that periodically rings about the cornices of that great polemical cockpit. We cannot at this moment state whether the Eardley under notice is a son or brother of the late holder of the title, who was a crusader against the impious, and accustomed to route periodically, with his admonitions, the echoes of Exeter Hall. At any rate he is o that ilk, though of quiet another far-

The Sir Eardley of the moment is a Culling from the worst offshoots of English rank and fashion. He is the same who, some three or four years since, obtained through false pretences, the living in England. A prosecution for was convicted, sentenced, and, so far as we remember, committed for the expiation of this crime. Family influence in England, however, like political influence here but too often shields the eriminal from the punishment that is his due; and so it happened that the Home Secretary issued a full pardon to the illustrious bigamite, who was then cast loose upon the society for which he was
