LADY MORDAUNT'S STATEMENTS. Mr. Serjeant Ballantine said he no proposed to question the witness as to the circumstances of Lady Mordannt's confinement, her, previous health, and the statements she then made.

Dr. Deane objected to this, urging the propriety of excluding as far as possible everything bearing on the main issue between Sir Charles, Lady Mordaupt, and other persons, and of confining the evidence to Lady Mordaunt's state of mind Great injuries would otherwise be done to persons who could not appear in this case, and the mair issue would be gone into and prejudiced His Lordship, admitting that these objections had some force, said the ones tion was whether these circumstances were marterial to the present issue, and the contention of the other side being that this lady was simulating insanity, he could not exclude facts which were relied upon as showing a motive for simula-

Dr. Deane was willing at once admit that there was the strongest motive for feigning insanity.

His Lordship asked Mr. Serjeant Bal-Mr. Serjeant Ballantine replied that he wished to bring forward evidence regarding the child and a disease from which it was suffering. His Lordship remarked that statements having, as it was alleged, been made compromising Lady Mordaunt's character. and constituting a strong motive for simulating manity the other side had a right to lay before the jury facts which might have been pressing on her mind and inducing her to take a particular course. If there was no question of good faith, all these matters would course be immaterial. Mr. Archibald, in support of the obection, cited the analogous case of ar inquiry whether a person accused of murder was in a fit state to plead, in which no evidence of the principal offence was admitted, though such a charge would furnish a strong motive for simulating insanity. The inquiry ought to be restricted to the question whether Lady Mordaunt was in a fit state to instructions to her legal advisers. The main issue would be much prejudiced by all these matters being gone into, and it would become necessary on the part of her friends to go back and examine the GENERAL, witnesses on all these matters from the very time of her confinement.

Mr. Serjeant Ballantine contended rounding circumstances might be gone in-

His lordship held that no such line could be drawn as to exclude all facts of April. He did not recollect a case which presented features similar to the present case. A great deal of evidence has been given to show that Lady Mordaunt's mind was effected, but her consimulation, and the petitioner could not without showing the circumstances under which the motive for such simulation was I insisted that it was material.
