Count Von Bismarck, Prime Minister of Prussia.

Otho, Count Von Bismarck-Schonhausen, Prime Minister of Prussia, and, with the sole exception of Napoleon III., the most famuus man of the present age, is the descendant of a long line of petty nobility, whose origin is lost in the remotest antiouity. Frederick the Great commencing life with almost puerile tastes, and in a condition of abject domestic subjection to the will of a crack-brained, eccentric father, built up the Prussian monarchy a 7 71 cents. century and a half ago. Bismarck, who by his eccentricity and irregular (not vicious) habits, earned for himself the deri-12 cent . sive appellation of Mad Bismarck, has outlived the depreciatory opinions of his youthful critics, and has, by the strength of his will and the torce of his political genius, torn the prestige of German lead 14 cents | ership from Austria, raised Prussia to rivalry with France for the premiership of Europe, and realized the dream of a great German empire by the consolidation of all the German states under the guidance of Prussia. To Bismarck's towering abilities. and to the immense strength of his political combinations, is owing more than to any other single or personal cause the present war. The tradition of French diplomacy will not admit of a superior or even of an such prices as will clear out the greater por-equal in the political equilibrium of Europe. Napoleon has found himself equalled, if not dominated, by Bismarck's poltical manœuvres, and neither the ambition of the Emperor nor the genius of the French nation can tolerate such an attaint on the national honor. Bismarck's moral courage and consummate tact have made Prussia what she is in this generation, and in the accomplishment of his high objects it is more than doubtful whether he did not countermine Napoleon's own plans. His antipathy to democracy was increased by the events of 1848, and in 1851 he became member of the Prussian Parliament, where his speeches on the new constitu tion and his aristocratic loyalism attracted French Wove, White and Grey, the attention of the Court. While on his wedding tour he accidentally encountered the King of Venice, and personal intercourse so confirmed the impression he had created that very soon afterwards he was appointed Prussian representative at the Frankfort Diet. There is, perhaps, no man in Europe of whom better stories are told than of Bismarck. Among others one is told of this particular epoch, showing his sense of his own dignity, and of the re spect due to him as representative of Prus sis. The young minister paid a ceremo nial visit to Count Thun, the Austrian Min ister and President of the Diet. Count Thun did not ask him to take a seat, but continued smoking. Bismarck, not disconcerted, took out his cigar case, and drawing a chair forward, asked the President for a light, and fairly smoked him into civility. In 1859 he was recalled from Frankfort, and sent Ambassador to St. Petersburg. In 1862 he was placed in charge of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The whole course of Prussian politics was at this time a constant protest at every point by the liberals and the democratic party against the crown and its authority. The opposition to every ministerial plan MENADINES - Black and Grey was virulent, and no success at home or abroad modified the hostility of the opposition. Even Prussian successes in the Schleswig-Holstein affair brought no peace to the councils of the nation. The general tendencies of Europe were towards an expansion of liberalism. Bismarck and the King believed that the national welfare lay in the consolidation of the royal power, in the control of the press, and in the increase of the standing army. The dispute with Austria sprang out of the increasing preponderance of

Prussia in all questions touching the common interests of Germany. The German all this Seasons Importations and quite new. principalities were being rapidly mediaquestion of armaments was a new jealousy, and her alliance, offensive and defensive LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S between Prussia and the new Kingdom of Italy, led to the warlike movements by Austria for the purpose of defending her Venetian dependencies, which led to Napoleon's appearance on the scene and to the expulsion of Austria from Italian soil. The sudden close of the Italian campaign at Solferino leaving Victor Emanuel's position only half assured, and transferring Savoy to France was hardly satisfactory to Prussia. It is generally believed that, in interviews which Bismarck had at Biarritz with Napoleon about this time the Prussian favored the Napoleonic claims to a Rhine frontier as a set off to Pruss a's long ings for Schleswig Holstein and Baltic ports. Austria now expressed her disapproval of Prussia's aggradizing views on the Duchies ; but to these protests Bismarck paid no attention, and the battles of Sadowa and Konigsgratz affirmed Prussian rights and silenced Austrian remonstrance. After the Austrian defeats Prussia consolidated the North German States, and brought them all under her control, subsidizing their princes and granting them pensions and allowances in place of their indepen dent revenues. Arrangements were also made with southern German States by which they retained their nominal independence, but Prussia was made commander-in-cchief of the joint army and head of the Customs Union, and the line of the territorial demarcation completely excluded Austria from all participation in the I new Bund. The Luxemburg affair, it will be remembered, or ginated from an attempt by Prussia to get possession from Holland of that fortress by purchase. This was objectionable to France, and the fortress was eventually dismantled and the territory neutralized. At this moment, owing to the consolidation of Germanic powers to the supremacy of Prusssia and to the powers granted Von Bismarck as Chancellor of the Federated States he is the most powerful minister in Europe, having personal influence and weight more analogous to that of Richelieu or Kannitz than to that of any modern minister. In person, Von Bismarck is tall, well formed, fair-haired, blue-eyed, and of great > is energetic and determined. His tastes are simple and popular, as a proof of which the national beer, both white, bock, and lager in great silver tankards and foaming goblets, is a feature of his entertainments. He has been once shot at, but though slightly wounded, arrested the assassin with his own strong hand, and the offender subsequently killed himself in Of his personal views M. de Vibort, a vigor. He is as hearty and joyous as she Parisian journalist, reports an interview, in which these words were uttered by Bismarck :-" Sixteen years ago' I was living as a country gentleman, when the King appointed me Envoy of Prussia at the Frankfort Diet. I had been brought up in the admiration, I might almost say the worship, of the Austrian policy. Much time, however, was not needed to dispel my youthful illusions. The humiliation of my country, Germany, sacrificed to the in terests of a foreign nation, a crafty and perfidious line of policy, these were not things calculated to give me satisfaction. · · I conceived the idea of snatching Germany from Austrian oppressionat least that part of Germany whose tone $2.00 per gallon, $6.00 per dozen. of thought, religion, manners, and interests, identify her destinies with Prussia-
