But these new comers from the desert, though not in the bosom of the family, are vastly amusing, and consciously so. This morning, on the Place de la Concorde, a merry Turco stood looking on at the exercises of a company of National Guards who were not very bright in their drill. He watched them with gravity and interest for some time. They went through the manual exercise, and prep red to march. The merry Turco took advantage of the opportunity. Putting a stick between his legs, he cocked his tarboosh, and pranced along the line with that peculiar hop and step which is supposed by our infant population to represent a horse's canter. There were thouands looking on. The officer, a finicking "Ma? gentleman, turned very red. and so did he cried. The line advanced, and down in Turco, who galloped up without a smile. It of the poor Guards, flank, and now dashed he stood on one other, eyeing the movement with that critical glance which distings hes an ancient martinet. The people roared my laughter; the officers grew redder, and, perhaps, muttered mild oaths between their tooth; the honest private did not know which way to look. "Remove that man !" cried the comman dant. "Halt !" They halted, but they did not remove the merry Turco, who Across the wave, and 'neath the first warm star, cantered to the middle of the line, From ships at sea some sweet remember'd strain. and frowningly acrutinized the equipment and bearing of the men. There was a little fat fellow who got desperately uncomfortable under this gaze. He glanced down at his boots to see if they were all right; then along his belt; he tried to twist around and examine his knapsack. "Remove that man !" roared the officer. No one stirred in the ranks, but the an-e dience shouted and held their sides. What would have happened I don't know, but a friend of the Turco came out from the crowd, and led him away, prancing all the time, and throwing back over his Captain Furstenberg, of the 10th Husars, had been wounded in the battle of Gravelotte, and passed the night of the 18th to the 19th on the battle-field. Recovering consciousness, after a fainting tit, Fed with wet scent of hills, through growing at dawn he observed some figures busying themselves about. One of them approach ing him, he noticed quite plainly the sign of the Knights of St. John on his armlet. He was just calling out to the man for aid, when his voice failed him at the view presented to his eye. The man with the St. John's cross called the three other figures to a group of wounded and dead. "Quite close to me (the deponent states) I plainly recognized a man in the garb of a field priest, and two Knights of the Order of St. John. When these men had arrived at the group, they commenced cutting open the uniforms of each at the breast with knives and scissors; whoever moved was choked at once by their hands; if nothing was found about their breasts, they examined pockets and hands, each ring on the hands being cut off with their tively at Woolwich arsenal, over a million finger.
