Death demonstrates his power apparently with almost indiscriminate action. To day All animated nature dies, and death the blushing maiden or the manly youth, All animated nature dies, and death wrests from man the fondest and most tenderly beleved objects of his heart. God so ordered it, and in view of the constantly recurring fact it is not possible that we should forget our own mortality. Yet it is but too true that men live as if they were never to die. One of our religious poets has said that, "All men think all men mortal but themselves," and the indifference which is commonly manifested by a large proportion of the living would seem to justify the sentiment. The subject of death is not a pleasant one to contemplate by persons living in a state of alienation from their Maker, and hence it is that the from their Maker, and hence it is that the consideration of that solemn and important but absolutely certain event is put off from one day to another until by some afflictive dispensation it is forced upon the unwilling mind.
