Going Through a Tunnel. I wish I were a certain bird whose mouth is like a funnel.

That I might sing with proper force of going through a tunnel; But still I will attempt it, as I'm very full of fun.

And everything I do is most imitatively done. Saxe wrote of "Riding on the Rail," but About the best part of the ride—the part of which I sing:

"All aboard!" and if you "peel" the You laugh in that immoderate way which makes a person cry.

Hurrah! we're in the tunnel now, and all is black as night. When suddenly I strike a match that shows a funny sight;

Talk of the power of Niobe—this beats it out and out. For nice young men are hugging all the pretty girls about.

That fellow just ahead has got a clean shirt half-way on. And that fellow in the white cravat is robbing Cousin John;

That gay old gal has taken out her false teeth on the fly. And that aristocratic chap is eating onion-pie!

The tunnel now is at an end, but while the train was in it, I saw some things that were the very darkest kind of deeds were done in half a minute;

And if there's any fearless man who hasn't seen his share, I'll take him up with me some fine day, and let him pay my fair.

A New Collection of Epitaphs. "Epitaphs Collected in Spare Moments," the title of a sketchy volume just published in England.

Its author is a "commercial traveller," who conceals his name, but says his book is "by a Commercial Traveller."

It is too modest, for his work is an interesting addition to a peculiar class of literature, and he is entitled to the credit of it.

He has made a record of the odd epitaphs he has encountered in journey in which his first lecture from the calls of business must always have been spent in the graveyard.

SCENE IN THE TORONTO "GLOBE" OFFICE. The Toronto, Telegraph says that the following scene occurred in the office of the Toronto Globe on Saturday morning last:

Reporter—(Rushing in excitedly)—Another accident on the Grand Trunk. Editor—(Calmly)—Ah! good—good. Reporter—Eighteen cars smashed up. Editor—Splendid! What more?

Reporter—Two locomotives destroyed. Editor—Better still. How many freight and live stock burned up. Editor—Oh, but this is welcome news. What next?

Reporter—Three persons killed and several wounded. Editor—Only three? But no matter; that will do for this time. Anything else?

Reporter—Two freight trains completely destroyed. Editor—Freight trains, did you say; only freight trains? Oh, that they had been passenger trains, with thirty victims in stead of three.

We must put up with freight smash ups, though I would they were passenger smash ups. But rush to the scene, my dear reporter, exaggerate, fabricate, lie. We must make the best of it we can. Only three; what a pity there was not thirty. As I remarked on an former occasion in my politics, so that I am bound to fight him on the management of the Grand Trunk. Go to the scene, and lie up best.

A Nice Cup of Tea. The celestial car loves the clink of bar-barian dollars, and manages it would seem, effectually to poison the tea without losing the customers. An English monthly, the Food Journal, says very plainly how this is done.

The "honest" waiter who is so fond of leaving it to the steam boiler, and the English tea-drinker takes the bitterness. Mutter, who has been conducting certain inquiries for the journal alluded to, declares that some gunpowder tea—which ought to be the best green—consists of common paper, mixed with a quantity of small, red, unknown seeds, and from which much burnt.

Another sample was made up of rice, faced with plumage and lampblack, with some pieces of free iron, and a little of the same. In one lot examined were pieces of decayed wood and fragments of seeds and stones, and another contained considerable quantities of lead, and a sample of Kaitow was made up of rice husks and other matters. One sample is described as "very common dust, mixed with a quantity of small, red, unknown seeds, and from which much burnt."

In one lot examined were pieces of decayed wood and fragments of seeds and stones, and another contained considerable quantities of lead, and a sample of Kaitow was made up of rice husks and other matters.

One of the inscriptions recorded is as follows: "She was—what? What a wife should be. She was—what? What a wife should be. She was—what? What a wife should be."

There is a polished quatrain on an inscription in Alverstone Churchyard in England: "A widow, whose husband died from the bursting of a blood-vessel, described the scene in four couplets, of which this is one: 'A sudden death's a shocking thing to see. His last life's blood was sprinkled over me.'"

How many voyagers their course perform; And how many a kinder fate obtain; This little bark a kinder fate obtain; This little bark a kinder fate obtain.

It is a curious fact, that at the same time retain their customers, they do not doubt continue to do so; but it is not very likely that, for the sake of retaining their weekly share of the revenue of the house, they will accept of their best customers, and close up a source from which they pocket such vast revenues of barbarian coin.
