At 9 o'clock in the morning the right wing of the French army, which was on the east of Lemans was suddenly attacked by the rear guard of the Prussians, which emerged from the wood on the extreme right of the French. Upon the alarm being given, the advance of the French infantry wheeled into a line of battle, the artillery pushing forward, through which it made up several ranks, and the cavalry took positions upon the the right and left wings. A more perfect ine of battle could not have been formed by an other army. The artillery were well supplied with ammunitions and the infantry with 100 rounds per man. Supply trains were o nveniently posted, and the bloody work began. The battle field was them to be the most effectual remedy for | u on he having had many years experience a valley.
