The guilty mind of Turlington was far from feeling satisfied with the meagre de scription of the stranger thus rendered He could not be engaged in surveying in the dark What could he want in the desolate neighborhood of the house and churchyard, at that time of night?

The man wanted - what the man found a little lower down the lane, hidden in a McMoran disman led part of the churchy a lead by the light of the pocket lintern which he carried with him, the letter first congratulited this person on the complete success of his disguise-and then promised that the writer would be ready at her bedroom window for flight the next morning, before the house was astir. The signature was " Natali-," and the person addressed was

" Dearest Launce." In the meanwhile, Turlington barred the window-shutters of the room, and looked at his watch. It wanted only a quarter to nine o'clock. He took his dogwhistle from the chimney-piece, and turned his steps at once in the direction of the drawing-room, in which his gue ts were

The Irish Point | sented the Field of dominated burnt brightiv; the lamps she is soft glow of light; the solid shutters and the thick red cur tains kept the cold night air on the outer side of two long windows, which opened on the back garden. Snug arm chairs were placed in every part of the room. In one of them Sir Joseph reclined fast askep: in another Miss Lavinia sat knitting; a third chair spart from the rest, near a round table in one corner of the room was occupied by Natalie. Her head was resting on her hand; an unread book lay open on her lap. She looked pale and harassed; anxiety and suspense had worm her down to the shadow of her former self. On entering the room, Turlington purposely closed the door with a bang. Natalie started. Miss Lavinis looked up reproachfully. The object was achieved, Sir Joseph was roused from his sleep. "If you are going to the vicar's to-

ves. Richard," he answered drowsily, " ! suppose I must go. Where is my hat?" His sister and his daughter both joined in trying to persuade him to send an excuse instead of groping his way to the vicarage in the dark. Sir Joseph hesitated as usual. He and the vicar had run upa sudden friendship on the strength of their common enthusiasm for the old fashioned game of backgammon. Victorious over his opponent on the previous evening; at Turlington's house, sir Joseph had promised to pass that evening at the vicarage, and give the vicar his revenge. Observing his indecision, Turlington cunningly irrisated him by affeoring to believe that he was really unwilling to venture out in the dark. "I'll see you safe across the churchyard," he said; " and the vicar's servant will see you safe back." The tone in which he spoke instantly roused Sir Joseph. " 1 am not in my second childhood yet, Richard," he replied, testily. "I can find my way by myself." He kissed his daug ater on the forehead. " No fear, Natalie. I shall be back in time for the mulled claret. No. Richard, I won't trouble you.' He kissed his hand to his sister, and went out into the hall for his hat; Turlington following with a rough apology, and asking as a favour to be permitted to accomp my mm part of the way only.
