That operation may have to be sought in the follies of a past generation, but its reality is the same neverthe less. Almost every war is the immediate consequence of a desire for vast wealth Nine bankruptcies out of ten are the con sequence of the absence of the spirit which which is stimulated by the throbs of social ambition. All the trickeries, the rash speculations, the swindlings which spread poor to pauperism, spring from that profoundly anti-Chaistian idea of human happiness which is dominant in English liter ature, English talk, and English speech making. To pretend that the nation generally is made more wealthy and false estimate of the value of huge fortunes is to overlook the plainest facts of human life, and to deny the first principles of really profound economical science. We hear a great deal about social evils, and especially about that which is described as "the social evil." Yet what is any one habit which lies on the surface of the social fabric, affecting chiefly its more dissipated and thoughless portions, compared with an unbridled passion, adopted by the whole of the respectable and influential members of society? What mischief can be compared with that universal lust for gain which is now taught on every side as the secret of national prosperity, and as at least not nconsistent with the profession of Christsnity as a religious creed? What, in all honesty, is to be expected from a generation which believes that he who gives up
