

Woolen Socks: 1st Mrs Trimble; 2nd Mrs Hare. Cotton Socks: 1st Mrs Allan; 2nd Mrs Watson.

his knees to Riel. Here is another scene for them to feast their eyes upon. Let them "picture" to themselves an Ontario public man, one of the leaders of the "great Reform party," an individual who was ever boasting of his purity and his honesty, and never came into contact with a hypocritical Pharisee and sham "pious" man, shaking him with an English merchant with one hand, and while he looks in his face with an oily, sanctimonious expression of countenance, with his other hand plunging deep into the unfortunate merchant's pocket. Then when the latter finds that he has been "gone through" by this Canadian "Job Trotter," and the poor Englishman turns his empty pockets inside out, while astonishment and dismay are depicted on his features, let them "picture" to themselves his despoiler aspiring to become Premier of the Province of Ontario. This is a little sketch, of course, only a faint picture, which would commend to the attention of our Grit friends.

Col. Clive's Wife.

"Dear little girl," "What had she done? He cut open the packet carefully for he could not bring himself to break through the seal, and when he found the contents to be a small morocco jewel case. She had prepared for him a keepsake, then, lest he should forget her while he was away, and she had put in it what was his? He hoped that it might be a lock, with her portrait enclosed in it, so that he could wear it always, and see her dear face at every moment. It was a large gold double lock of simple design, like one he had often seen her wear. On one side the reverse letters, H. C. and L. T. were engraved, and it contained a vignette likeness of Laura, taken in Scotland just before her illness, 1845.

The gangway, poised at an angle on nearly forty-five degrees, rolled with a heavy, shuddering noise, and the passengers in the uncertain light.

DENNEY MURDER CASE.

The examination of the prisoner, charged with the murder of George Denney, resumed in the Court House yesterday before Judge Armstrong. The following evidence was heard:

John Henry Nudd deposed:—I reside in Providence, where I was employed as a glazier in the establishment of Faver, the 24th September, the prisoner was employed in the same place, and boarded at my house. I last saw Geo. H. Faver about 8.30 a.m. the 5th inst. He was then in the street, and I saw him in the neighborhood of the front. The prisoner did not come to my house to dinner at the usual hour, 12 o'clock. About 11.30 in the forenoon he left the store, and I saw him in the neighborhood of the front. The prisoner did not come to my house to dinner at the usual hour, 12 o'clock. About 11.30 in the forenoon he left the store, and I saw him in the neighborhood of the front.

prisoner had to keep the cellar clean. Denney was subservient to Nutt's orders and witness and prisoner were three or four times in the office together after hours. At the time the murder occurred, never observed anything out of the way; went to the cellar about half past seven in the morning for some glass, and observed the prisoner, but he appeared to be going about his business as usual. The iron bar referred to in evidence was used by nearly every one in the place. The body was found in the cellar on Friday, the 24th September, at the prisoner and remarked that the cellar was unusually clean.

THIRD ANNUAL SOCIETY.

St. Patrick's Hall, Wednesday, October 2nd, 1872. Tickets, 50 cents. D. BEHAN, W.M. McCAFFREY, Secretary.

Canadian Institute.

Wednesday, October 2nd, 1872. Tickets, 50 cents. D. BEHAN, W.M. McCAFFREY, Secretary.

Temperley's Line.

LONDON, QUEBEC, and Montreal. Composed of the following or other class Powerful Iron Steamships:

EMPEROR. The steamers of this Line are intended to sail weekly as follows during the season of navigation of 1872, to and from:

FROM LONDON. Emperor, Wednesday, 11th Sept. Hector, Thursday, 21st do. Medway, Thursday, 19th Sept. Scotland, Friday, 28th do.

FROM QUEBEC. Medway, Thursday, 19th Sept. Scotland, Friday, 28th do. Emperor, Wednesday, 11th Sept. Hector, Thursday, 21st do.

DAVID SHAW, Agent. Office over Hope and Co's, Sparks street.

MORNING STAR. COAL STOVES of six different patterns for sale by description of Price and Public Building.

MOT AIR PURIFIER. Which we are prepared to furnish in Churches and Private Residences.

WANTED by three gentlemen with money to invest in real estate.

It is astonishing that in this city a new building with dwellings, three stories in height, is being erected.

NOTICE: I am sorry to say, however, that I am unable to do so.

ARRIAGE LICENSES. The undersigned is re-appointed Agent for the Government for the issue of MARRIAGE LICENSES.

FOR SALE. DANIEL'S HOTEL. (LATE ST JAMES). Corner of Metcalfe and Queen Streets.

INVENTIONS. Truly, this is the age of inventions, and we are beginning to understand the value of the human mind.

TRAVELLER'S GUIDE. OTTAWA AND OTTAWA RAILWAY. OTTAWA CENTRAL RAILWAY.

OTAWA FIRE CO. St. Patrick's Hall. Canadian Institute.

TEMPERLEY'S LINE. LONDON, QUEBEC, and Montreal.

MORNING STAR. COAL STOVES of six different patterns for sale by description of Price and Public Building.

MOT AIR PURIFIER. Which we are prepared to furnish in Churches and Private Residences.

WANTED by three gentlemen with money to invest in real estate.

It is astonishing that in this city a new building with dwellings, three stories in height, is being erected.

NOTICE: I am sorry to say, however, that I am unable to do so.

ARRIAGE LICENSES. The undersigned is re-appointed Agent for the Government for the issue of MARRIAGE LICENSES.

FOR SALE. DANIEL'S HOTEL. (LATE ST JAMES). Corner of Metcalfe and Queen Streets.

INVENTIONS. Truly, this is the age of inventions, and we are beginning to understand the value of the human mind.

NOTICE: I am sorry to say, however, that I am unable to do so.

ARRIAGE LICENSES. The undersigned is re-appointed Agent for the Government for the issue of MARRIAGE LICENSES.

FOR SALE. DANIEL'S HOTEL. (LATE ST JAMES). Corner of Metcalfe and Queen Streets.

INVENTIONS. Truly, this is the age of inventions, and we are beginning to understand the value of the human mind.

Home Made Carpet: 1st Mrs Trimble; 2nd Mrs Watson. Home Made Shawl: 1st Mrs Henderson; 2nd Mrs Watson.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

Ancient Order of Foresters—Yeoman. Notice—Prudent Rate. Temperley's Line—C R Cunningham.

PROVINCIAL EXHIBITION.

PROVINCIAL EXHIBITION. CANADA CENTRAL OFFICE. Opposite the Russell House, Elgin St. Sept 23, 1872.

PROVINCIAL EXHIBITION.

PROVINCIAL EXHIBITION. CANADA CENTRAL OFFICE. Opposite the Russell House, Elgin St. Sept 23, 1872.

OTAWA TIMES.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1872. LATEST TELEGRAPHIC ITEMS.

The Provincial Fair in Hamilton promises to be the finest ever held in Canada. One more explanation has just taken place in the "Great Bore" of Massachusetts.

Mahomed Pasha, Turkish Ambassador to France, is dead. Very stormy weather on the English coast is reported, and much damage was done to shipping on Monday night last.

The three rival factions of the International Society in New York all met as usual yesterday. The time of the two antagonistic Councils was chiefly taken up in discussing the recent Congress at Hague, that body being fiercely anathematized by one faction and enthusiastically eulogized by the other.

The Globe still continues to eulogize the extraordinary idea, that Lieutenant Governor Howland must be guided by Mr. Blake as to who is to be called upon to form the next Ontario Administration.

The investigation into the cause of the recent earthquake in Long Island has been brought to a conclusion. The decision of the inspectors exempts the officers of the Mait from the worst imputations that have been made against the latter, but moderately condemns the lack of judgment and of discipline displayed, and finds that sufficient provisions had not been made for saving life.

The inscription in Cuba is unhappily not yet suppressed, and we learn from Mexico that it is officially announced that the number of insurgents in arms against the Government in Cuba is 4,500. It is a great misfortune that the prosperity of that beautiful island should be destroyed in consequence of the turbulent disposition of a comparatively small number of the inhabitants, who, now King Amadeus has shown his inclination to initiate a really liberal and generous policy towards the Cubans, have little excuse for any further resistance to the legitimate authorities.

Some sense of shame appears at length to have been felt by the leading Grit organ, for it apologizes in a lame kind of way for its indecent reference to Sir George Cartier's illness. It says: "The fact that Sir George is in very bad health is not new, though we have not hitherto announced it as such."

Our stock of Carpets is now complete, and is one of the largest and best assorted ever offered in the city, having placed our orders early last autumn, we are enabled to sell much under present prices.

RUSSELL & WATSON. Extensive stock of Wool Carpets, in two and three ply; also Super, which we are offering at last season's prices.

PARTISAN ABUSE. The V. F. Albion alluding to the prevalence of partisan abuse both in the United States and Canada says: "Do not the politician and their ardent supporters on the Press, readily understand the contempt they are bringing on their most cherished institutions by such unbridled comments? Can they foresee the cynical comments that this reckless resort to venomous shafts must suggest to the enemies of the freedom of debate?"

It seemed to him that every one must know of the fact that somebody, possibly the old man opposite, would inevitably try to snatch it from his grasp before the night was over. The little fellow, however, was not to be so easily deceived.

Meanwhile the train sped on at a tremendous pace, and the rain and the wind in spite of the obscuring black clouds could be seen scudding rapidly across the sky. On the main road, the rain was pouring down in a deluge.

On the way, through the chalk hills of Croydon and Reigate, through the beautiful hop-gardens of Kent, the bare, staked poles looking weird and desolate enough now, in the fitful fantastic light thrown upon them by the engine lamps.

LOOK ON THIS PICTURE. A Grit contemporary says: "Just think of it, gentle reader,—the Finance Minister finds a refuge among the mountains of Colorado, and the Minister of Militia is compelled to make terms with an outlaw, a rebel, and a murderer: like Riel before he can be permitted to secure a seat for himself in the Commons House of Representatives."

A person of vivid imagination might possibly manage to picture to himself a scene like that which is here described, but it would be utterly untrue to suppose that Sir George Cartier did anything of the kind.

When Col. Clive, after standing for a minute or so by the engine, and reached the top of the flight of steps, he found his further progress arrested by a lady and gentleman, who, after putting a number of questions to a sea-faring man who was standing by, about the state of the weather, and receiving rather a large amount of truth.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

It seemed to him that every one must know of the fact that somebody, possibly the old man opposite, would inevitably try to snatch it from his grasp before the night was over.

Meanwhile the train sped on at a tremendous pace, and the rain and the wind in spite of the obscuring black clouds could be seen scudding rapidly across the sky.

On the way, through the chalk hills of Croydon and Reigate, through the beautiful hop-gardens of Kent, the bare, staked poles looking weird and desolate enough now.

LOOK ON THIS PICTURE. A Grit contemporary says: "Just think of it, gentle reader,—the Finance Minister finds a refuge among the mountains of Colorado, and the Minister of Militia is compelled to make terms with an outlaw, a rebel, and a murderer."

A person of vivid imagination might possibly manage to picture to himself a scene like that which is here described, but it would be utterly untrue to suppose that Sir George Cartier did anything of the kind.

When Col. Clive, after standing for a minute or so by the engine, and reached the top of the flight of steps, he found his further progress arrested by a lady and gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

It seemed to him that every one must know of the fact that somebody, possibly the old man opposite, would inevitably try to snatch it from his grasp before the night was over.

Meanwhile the train sped on at a tremendous pace, and the rain and the wind in spite of the obscuring black clouds could be seen scudding rapidly across the sky.

On the way, through the chalk hills of Croydon and Reigate, through the beautiful hop-gardens of Kent, the bare, staked poles looking weird and desolate enough now.

LOOK ON THIS PICTURE. A Grit contemporary says: "Just think of it, gentle reader,—the Finance Minister finds a refuge among the mountains of Colorado, and the Minister of Militia is compelled to make terms with an outlaw, a rebel, and a murderer."

A person of vivid imagination might possibly manage to picture to himself a scene like that which is here described, but it would be utterly untrue to suppose that Sir George Cartier did anything of the kind.

When Col. Clive, after standing for a minute or so by the engine, and reached the top of the flight of steps, he found his further progress arrested by a lady and gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

It seemed to him that every one must know of the fact that somebody, possibly the old man opposite, would inevitably try to snatch it from his grasp before the night was over.

Meanwhile the train sped on at a tremendous pace, and the rain and the wind in spite of the obscuring black clouds could be seen scudding rapidly across the sky.

On the way, through the chalk hills of Croydon and Reigate, through the beautiful hop-gardens of Kent, the bare, staked poles looking weird and desolate enough now.

LOOK ON THIS PICTURE. A Grit contemporary says: "Just think of it, gentle reader,—the Finance Minister finds a refuge among the mountains of Colorado, and the Minister of Militia is compelled to make terms with an outlaw, a rebel, and a murderer."

A person of vivid imagination might possibly manage to picture to himself a scene like that which is here described, but it would be utterly untrue to suppose that Sir George Cartier did anything of the kind.

When Col. Clive, after standing for a minute or so by the engine, and reached the top of the flight of steps, he found his further progress arrested by a lady and gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

It seemed to him that every one must know of the fact that somebody, possibly the old man opposite, would inevitably try to snatch it from his grasp before the night was over.

Meanwhile the train sped on at a tremendous pace, and the rain and the wind in spite of the obscuring black clouds could be seen scudding rapidly across the sky.

On the way, through the chalk hills of Croydon and Reigate, through the beautiful hop-gardens of Kent, the bare, staked poles looking weird and desolate enough now.

LOOK ON THIS PICTURE. A Grit contemporary says: "Just think of it, gentle reader,—the Finance Minister finds a refuge among the mountains of Colorado, and the Minister of Militia is compelled to make terms with an outlaw, a rebel, and a murderer."

A person of vivid imagination might possibly manage to picture to himself a scene like that which is here described, but it would be utterly untrue to suppose that Sir George Cartier did anything of the kind.

When Col. Clive, after standing for a minute or so by the engine, and reached the top of the flight of steps, he found his further progress arrested by a lady and gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

It seemed to him that every one must know of the fact that somebody, possibly the old man opposite, would inevitably try to snatch it from his grasp before the night was over.

Meanwhile the train sped on at a tremendous pace, and the rain and the wind in spite of the obscuring black clouds could be seen scudding rapidly across the sky.

On the way, through the chalk hills of Croydon and Reigate, through the beautiful hop-gardens of Kent, the bare, staked poles looking weird and desolate enough now.

LOOK ON THIS PICTURE. A Grit contemporary says: "Just think of it, gentle reader,—the Finance Minister finds a refuge among the mountains of Colorado, and the Minister of Militia is compelled to make terms with an outlaw, a rebel, and a murderer."

A person of vivid imagination might possibly manage to picture to himself a scene like that which is here described, but it would be utterly untrue to suppose that Sir George Cartier did anything of the kind.

When Col. Clive, after standing for a minute or so by the engine, and reached the top of the flight of steps, he found his further progress arrested by a lady and gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

It seemed to him that every one must know of the fact that somebody, possibly the old man opposite, would inevitably try to snatch it from his grasp before the night was over.

Meanwhile the train sped on at a tremendous pace, and the rain and the wind in spite of the obscuring black clouds could be seen scudding rapidly across the sky.

On the way, through the chalk hills of Croydon and Reigate, through the beautiful hop-gardens of Kent, the bare, staked poles looking weird and desolate enough now.

LOOK ON THIS PICTURE. A Grit contemporary says: "Just think of it, gentle reader,—the Finance Minister finds a refuge among the mountains of Colorado, and the Minister of Militia is compelled to make terms with an outlaw, a rebel, and a murderer."

A person of vivid imagination might possibly manage to picture to himself a scene like that which is here described, but it would be utterly untrue to suppose that Sir George Cartier did anything of the kind.

When Col. Clive, after standing for a minute or so by the engine, and reached the top of the flight of steps, he found his further progress arrested by a lady and gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

It seemed to him that every one must know of the fact that somebody, possibly the old man opposite, would inevitably try to snatch it from his grasp before the night was over.

Meanwhile the train sped on at a tremendous pace, and the rain and the wind in spite of the obscuring black clouds could be seen scudding rapidly across the sky.

On the way, through the chalk hills of Croydon and Reigate, through the beautiful hop-gardens of Kent, the bare, staked poles looking weird and desolate enough now.

LOOK ON THIS PICTURE. A Grit contemporary says: "Just think of it, gentle reader,—the Finance Minister finds a refuge among the mountains of Colorado, and the Minister of Militia is compelled to make terms with an outlaw, a rebel, and a murderer."

A person of vivid imagination might possibly manage to picture to himself a scene like that which is here described, but it would be utterly untrue to suppose that Sir George Cartier did anything of the kind.

When Col. Clive, after standing for a minute or so by the engine, and reached the top of the flight of steps, he found his further progress arrested by a lady and gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.

"What sort of a passage do you think it will be, sailor?" asked the lady timidly. "You don't call it a very bad night I suppose?" remarked the gentleman.