Possibly if instead of confining himself to the neighbourhood of the Brevoort House, Mr. Froude were to take a stroll through the Five Points and some of the streets on the East side of New York, he would find that poverty and its natural accompaniment "Empire City." "How did you come to write the history of England and how long did it take you to write it?" enquired the reporter. Mr. Frouds explained the circumstances which induced him to undertake the task, and stated that from first to last it had occupied thirty years. England's probable decadence was then the theme of the reporter's conversation, but unfortunately Mr. Froude did not give the right answers to the interrogatories put to him on this subject. Instead of saying as Goldwin Smith did at the Loyal League dinner, that his "great regre; was that he never could American," instead of intimating as Dilke would have done under similar circumstances' that Great Britain was "played out," and all her strength and grandeur lost and merged in the universal Yankee nation, Mr. Froude, to his honour be it spoken, refrained from doing or saying anything of the kind. On the contrary, much no doubt to his interviewer's disgust, he replied, and had the bad taste too to reply in "a pleasant cheery voice" that "England has had a great past and has just as great a future before her."
