WHAT A BELL SAID. It was a soft, hazy day in early June, a house into bowers and leafy retreats. could not resist the appeal, even if wished; so forth I went, now wading through green meadow grass, anon stopping to notice a perfect tairy bower, corered with the redly-blushing faces of June roses. At last, passing into a smooth weil beaten footpath, 1 loitered on aimlessly, caring for no other companion than nature, whose gentle hand led me until 1 came to an old kirk, whose rugged, gray stone walls were softened and almost hidden by climbing ivy.

Something about the appearance of the edifice, its air of quiet peace and its pic-turesqe surroundings, attracted me, and l entered. After examining the interior sat down, overcome with fatigue, in one of the large, old-fashioned pews, and a delicious languor crept over me. How long I had been seated there cannot tell. Suddenly I heard the strong deep tones of the bell, in what at first seemed to me a confused clangor; but after listening intently a few moments the sounds finally resolved themselves into words, and the great bell spoke: "Many a year has passed away with silent footsteps, young eyes have dimmed and brown locks silvered. But still from my ancient nook, have seen countless springs born amid smiles, rejoicings, and gay flowers, and marked the wane of countless sutumns, and heard the last faint sighs of both as they were wafted into silence. Here every holy Sabbath for years and years have I rung out in my clearest and sweetest tones a call to God's worshippers, and have bidden them gather with love and reverence.

sorrow of the living, there was a note of peace and comfort as I whispered of the weary soul at rest. "Joyously I rang when I welcomed the marriage guests to these portals, every note a blessing on the fair young head of the bride, and, then, when they emerged thence, how gladly sounded my God passionate laughter of summer, the gorgeous firewoods of autumn, and the sharp frosts of winter. I have seen and loved them all. The dainty birds brush their shining wings in fearless play against me. The whispering zephyrs and glancing rain-drops caress my old face, rough and harsh though it is, Many a time and oft have I basked in the effulgent sheen of sunlight, or caught the first pencillings of the morning. Undaunted I hear the hourse, deep voice of the thunder, or face the lightning's jugged flash. The storm howls fiercely about me. I stand unmoved. untired sentinel. The old bell ceased, and silence filled the building. It was broken at last by the deep tones of the bell sounding the evening hour, and I awoke with a start. Night had tallen, and shadows were stealing softly through the weird old windows, that were like the eyes of an aged p-rson, filmy and din; and I arose and walked musingly honieward, pondering on my dream.
