ARTIFICIAL BUTTER.

The French are ingenious in their presaration of food. They are most successul in deceiving the palate with substitutes which cost less than the genuine article, Of this class of food we suppose is that recently noticed in the Popular Scientific Monthly, and which originated from a request of the victualling department of the rench Navy for some wholesome substitute for butter. To meet this request Mege Mourier, after a long course of experiments, has succeeded in producing an excellent substitute for genuine butter that does not secome rancid with time, and is otherwise lighly recommended. The following details of the process are given by the Experiments made with cows submitted o a very severe and scanty diet led to the discovery that they continue to give milk. though in a greatly diminished quantity, and that this milk always contains butter: whence it is inferred that this butter was ormed from the fat contained in the animal tissues, the fat undergoing conversion into butter through the influence of the milk secreting fluids. Acting on this hint Mourier's process begins with splitting up the animal's fats. Finely divided fresh beef suet is placed in a vessel containing water, carbonate of potash and fresh sheep's stomachs, previously cut up into small fragments. The temperature of the mixture is then raised to about 112 Fahr., when, under the joint influence of the pep-sin and the heat, the fat becomes separated from the cellular tissue. The fatty matter floating on the top is decanted, and after cooling, submitted to very powerful hydraulic pressure. The semi-fluid olcomargarine is thus separated from the stearine, and becomes the basis of the butter to be afterward produced. One hundred pounds of this olco-margarine, along with about twenty-two quarts of milk and eighteen quarts of water, are poured into a churn, and to this mixture required to be kept for a long time, it is melted by a gentle heat, in order to eliminate all the water. The wife of Pere Hyacinthe is said to have lost a large part of her fortune by Shocking End of a Young Woman .-Ellen Hume, twenty-two years of age, was the daughter of a laborer. She died last week, and at the inquest as to the cause of death, the mother stated that her daughte only went home at intervals, and for short periods. On Saturday evening she went home, and complained of being very ill. She had often been in gaol, and had been away six or seven months. She was a very drunken girl, and had pawned nearly all her clothing for drink, She was put in the garret, and had a chaff bed on the floor. Her mother did not see her from the time she came home till after her death on Tuesday afternoon. No medical aid was called in. A woman, who lived in the same house as deceased's mother, said she told the mother she ought to calf in a doctor, and Mrs. Humg said, 'Let her go to the hospital; no doctor shall come here.' Both the parents of the deceased took drink, but the mother was the worst. The jury, in returning a verdict of died from natural causes, accelerated by the dissolue life and drunken habits of the deceased, expressed their opinion that the were open to very glect of, and unnatural conduct towards their daughter in her last illness.—"Liver.
