On Thursday, the 25th day of September, 1862, Gen. Davis called at Nelson's headquarters to confer with him upon the DUSH LOT FOR SALE general subject of the citizen soldiery under his command, and especially about their arms. The previous interviews of the two Generals had been marked by the abrupt and dictatorial manner, which unhappily distinguished Gen. Nelson on the one hand, and the chagrin of the proud and fiery Indianian on the other. But in the meeting of the men on Thursday night, Davis seemed to have forgotten any incivilities of his superior officer, and entered Nelson's office smiling, and greeted his commander warmly. In the course of the conversation about arms for his men. Nelson asked Davis how many guns he
