

LOVE CONQUERS ALL.

From the French of Balzac.

The wedding of Tiennette was a sight to see. The Abbey was crowded. The Queen herself gave up her riding robes, and the King, in letters patent, granted her a special privilege to wear the golden earings, which was forbidden to serfs by the sumptuary laws of that time. The Abbot Hugo pronounced the benediction, and the handsome pair left the church for the lodging of Amelie—now a serf.

The serf had forged himself a silver bracelet, which he wore on his left arm, showing that he was a serf of the domain of the Abbey of St. Germain. And as they passed the people found them walking side by side, and the crowd lined along the streets, and shouted "Viv! Noel!" as if he had been a new king.

When Amelie reached at her door, she found the iron which had supported her sign had been decorated with green boughs and knots of blue ribbon. And all the principal inhabitants of the town were there to wish him joy, and to swear him with a hand and a kiss, and they all came out to him. You will always be a nobleman, Master Amelie, in spite of the moles.

They passed the honeymoon. The greatest happiness. Tiennette was delighted with her fine husband, and won the kindness of most belies who came to buy her and had all a pleasant word for herself and husband. At the end of the month, who should come in great pomp but the old Abbots, Hugo de Sante, their lord and master, who entered into the house, and all the nobility belonging to the domain of the abbey, to the Chapter, and two spouses: "My children, you are free, and quit of all manorial power; and I must tell you, that at the very first I was greatly moved at the love which united you together, and so I was moved when the rights of the Abbey had been firmly recognized, and made you entirely happy, and that the act of manumission shall cost you nothing. And Amelie's house, land and goods are all his again, seeing that he had such confidence in his wife." So saying, he gave her both a little slap on the cheek, which was the right punishment in receiving which the serf felt at his feet, kissing his hands and weeping for joy. And the news spreading like wild fire through the neighborhood; every one turned out to see and thank the Abbots. And on his return to the Abbey, Amelie and the bride of his master, for the gates of Bussy. On the road he scattered silks among the maimed, and the blind, crying "Largess! Largess! to God! God! save and bless the Abbots! Long live the serf to Lord Hugo!" And when he returned to his own home, he was in a joyful feast, which lasted a whole week.

This fond couple lived together long and happily and had a numerous family who settled in Touraine and became of the nobility. Not did Amelie have her way, for on the death of her master his son brought the two niches of silver which he had wove. These two treasures were placed on the chief altar of the Church, and were esteemed the most valuable things in the possession of the Abbey.

Strangers came from far to see them, and to see the loves of the Touraine and the lovely Tiennette was spread all over France.

The moral of this history is that love conquers all things—even the prejudices and covetousness of monks.
