While the minor milliners were prophesy- come in. ing that she would shut up shop, she was quietly currying on a private correspondence with an agent in Paris, Nobody knew what these letters were about untia few weeks had elapsed, and then circulars were received by all the ladies in Pisa, announcing that the best French forewo man who could be got for money was engaged to superintend the great Grifoni establishment. This master stroke decided the victory. All the Demoiserle's custom ers declined giving orders elsewhere until the forewoman from Paris had exhibited to the natives of Pisa the latest fashions

The Frenchwoman arrived punctual to the appointed day, -glib and curt, smiling and flippant, tight of face and supple of figure. Her name was Mademoiselle Virginie, and her family had inhumanly deserted her. She was set to work the moment she was inside the doors of the Grifoni establishment, A room was devoted to her own private use; magnificent mate rials in velvet, silk, and satin, with due ON the recommendation of the Hon. the Minaccompaniment of muslins, laces, and was told to spare no expense, and to produce, in the shortest possible time, the inest and newest specimen-dresses for exher orders to the Italian girls in the work-"I have the very person you want," cried Demoiselle Grifoni, "A workwoman we call Brigids here—the idlest slut in Pisa, but as sharp as a needle -has been in France, and speaks the language like a native. I'll send her to you directly." Mademoiselle Virginie was not left long alone with her patterns and silks. A tail woman, with bold black eyes, a reckless manner, and a step as firm as a man's, stalked into the room with a gait of a tragedy-queen crossing the stage. The instant her eyes fell on the French forewoman, she stopped, threw up her hands in astonishment, and exclaimed, "Finette!" "Teress!" cried the Frenchwoman, cast-a few steps. "Hush! call me Brigida." "Hush! call me Virginie."

These two exclamations were uttered at the same moment, and then the two women scrutinised each other in silence. The a dull yellow, and the voice of the French-"How, in the name of Heaven, have you roughly round her neck, and kissed her on the cheek, "Let us be friends again," she said. The Frenchwoman laughed, "Tell me how I have had my revenge," pursued Department of Marine and Fisheries, the other, tightening her grasp. Mademoiselle Virginie signed to Brigida to stoop, and whispered rapidly in her ear. The Italian whispered eagerly, with suspicious eyes fixed on the door. When the whispering ceased, she loosened her hold and, with a sigh of relief, pushed back her heavy black hair from her temples. "Now we are friends," she said, and sat down indolently in a chair placed by the work-pins ready for use by putting them between her teeth. "I am here, I believe, for the purpose of ruining the late forewoman, who has set up in opposition to us? Good! I will ruin her. Spread out the yellow brocaded silk, my dear, and pin that pattern on at your end, while I pin it at mine. And what are your plans, Brigida? (Mind you don't forget that Finette is dead, and that Virginie has risen from her ashes.) You can't possibly intend to stop here all your life?
