It is years one bushel of wheat has not been therefore the merest hypocrisy to call this an act of political villainy. The second branch of the charge is that the Ministers endeavored to deprive him of his office. First Mr. Young says that when the General Inspection Act was pussed by Parliament he supposed that it would neither deprive him of b's seat nor of his office, and his reason for supposing this was that the emoluments of the office were to be derived from fees. Surely Mr. Young could not have thought anything of thesort. He must have known that no officers under Government, whose salaries are derived either from fees or the public chest, are capable of sitting in Perliament how then could an exception have been made in favor of inspectors. Their offices are in the gift of the Crown, just as all other offices are, and there is just as much danger to the independence of Parliament
