'It is rather less than half a century ago,' he began, 'since I first set foot in this beautiful Devon county. I came down on a short holiday from London, in the summer time to fish, and 1 brought with me. chambers from without. On one side was colored viscid matter with which the with fruit, made the air faint with frabowels are loaded, at the same time grance; haif orchard was the garden, too, in fruit, through which, beneath a rustic bridge, my trout stream wandered Char-

were in her eyes, ready to fall, - I saw. 'There, then, I met Kate. The good man of the house was childless, and she, his cousin, was well cared for as his child. It was no wonder, George; the dark oak parlour seemed to need no light when she shone in it. Like Sunbeam gliding over common places, whatever household matters busied her she graced. Some sweet art seemed to be in her, superior to mere neatness, as high heartedness exalteth pride. I put on salmon flies to catch trout. often fished without any hook at all. strove to image her fair face and form in the clear waters, by the side of that hapless similitude of myself—the reflex of a forlorn youth in his first love. I did my best at hay making to please her. I took eternal lessons in the art of making Devon cheese. I got at last so far as to kiss her hand. I drew a little, and she sat to me for her portrait. We sailed out a mushrooning and getting wild flowers, and on our way sang pleasant songs together, and interchanged our little stores of read ing. On the eye before my long put-off departure we were thus roaming; we had to cross a hundred stiles-the choicest blessing of this country I used to think them-and once instead of offering my hand to hely her over, I held out both my arms, and, upon my life, George, the dear girl jamped right into them; and

- What shocking stories you are telling, Robert," said Mrs. Chetwood, and certainly she was then blushing up under her lace "Well, my dear, nobody was there exe cept Kate and myself, and I think I must know what happened, at least as well as you do; so," he continued, "after one more visit to the farm-house, Kate and I were married; she gave up all her healthy ways and country pleasure to come and live with me in the busy town, studious of others' happiness, careful for others' pain : at all times forgetful of herself, active and diligent, she had ever lessure for a please ant word and a kind action; and for beauty, no maid nor wife in the world was fit, I believe, to compare with her to you, George, who knew and loved our dearest Gertrude, I need not describe her mother. She was not long with me, but t soon seemed as if it must have cost my life to have parted with her; yet the girlish glory faded, and the sparkling spirit fled, and the day has been forgiven, though forgotten never, which took my darling Kate from my side."

The old man paused a litte here. Mrs.

"My second wife," he resumed, "was not so young, and certainly had not the outward graces of my first. She was beautiful, too, in the flower as Kate was in the bud; her face had not the vivacity. nor her eyes the dancing light of Kate's, but there sat such a serenity upon Ler features, as we sometimes see upon a lovely land cape when the sun is near its setting; a look which no man ever tires of; and Mary bore me children, and then much as I had loved the sapling, it seemed to me that the full-fruited tree was dearer vet. She was no country girl from the Devon dales but a town lady, bred. I had a great house by that time, with all things fitting about me, and my sphere was hers. The pearls suited her pleasant brow, and crowned her still raven tresses as becomingly as the single rose in her hair had adorned simple Kate, I think, if I may say so without ingratitude for any present great happiness, and with the leave of my dear Charlotte, that the happiest hours of my life were spent during those days when our children's voices rang cheerily over the house, and some little scheme of pleasure for them was my everyday desire and Mary's. Even at the terrible time when boy and girl were being taken from us at once, never did the rosti at mother seem more dear to me; from when the hush of sickness stole upon us at first, to the day when that white procession left our doors, what a healing spirit was she ! When we thought that the thickly folded veil of sorrow had fallen over us for ever. how tenderly she put it aside!

"It must needs have happened that my speech has here been melancholy, but indeed 1 should not speak of Mary so, She was the blithest cheerfullest, most comfortable middle-aged wife that man ever had; behind our very darkest trouble a smile was always lying ready to struggle through it, and what a light it shed! One of your resigned immovesble females, who accept every blessing as a temptation. and submit with precisely the same feels ings to what they call every chastening, would have killed me in a week. George. my Mary acted at all times according to her nature, and that nature was as beauwomankind. You might well think that Kate and Mary were two prizes great enough for one man to draw out of a marriage lottery, and yet I drew another. When I lost my beloved Mary, my third wife took her place in my immost heart. "Kiss me, Charlotte," said the old man. tenderly, and again she kissed him on the
