PROHIBITION.

From the Brant Union (Conservative.)

Among the many subjects which engaged the attention of the House of Comons during the session just closed, there vas none that had been more generally scussed both pro and con, than Mr. oss's resolutions on prohibtion. - The nany petitions presented to the House luring the last three sessions of Parliament had so forced the question upon the attention of the members, that it was apossible, without insulting the intelli gence of the petitioners, any longer to reuse some consideration to their request. The course pursued by Mr. Ross in the nanagement of this very perplexing and comentious question, was evidently dictated by prudence and sound policy. During the sessions of 1873 and energies were directed towards hoppers. making out a case against the liquor traffic. The several reports published by the Committee of which he was the chairman fully sustained the position he took, riz., that there was a pressing necessity for some legislation by which the fearfu amount of crime chargeable to the liquor traffic might be more effectually restrained than it was under our present license to marry again, and she was obliged to sit lation required was nothing less than a not go a step-farther. satisfy the House that such a law was feasible and effective, by requesting a before he died, we have no doubt it would ommission to investigate in the neighbouring States and report upon the opertaion of such laws where tried, and also that it might be and effective. With that report before sponded the man. him-a report carefully, ably, and impartially prepared—he appealed to the House, not asking Parliament to pass a rohibitory law at once, but gradually to close in upon the enemy by affirming the principle of Prohibition, leaving further action for a subsequent session.
