The clerk of a merchant at Osaka, in Japan, went to Kioto on the business his employer, and received one thousand yen to carry back to Osaka. Having been detained longer than he expected, he missed the steamboat, and being anxious to complete his journey as quickly as possible, took a jinrikisha, intending to travel through the night and reach Osaka before daylight. On arriving at a village a few miles from his destination, about 3 a.m. a man with a drawn sword stopped the vehicle and demanded the thousand yen stating that he had seen the youth receive it at Kioto, After some demur the clerk took the money from his bosom, and was about to hand it to the robber when the jinrikisha coolie snatched the b g and made off, leaving the vehicle, the clerk, and the robber in the middle of the road, the two latter as speechless as the former. The knight of the road, finding himself foiled, departed in the direction opposite to that of Osaka, to which city the youth hastened, after abandoning his first thoughts of jumping into the river.
