"THE ABBE CONSTANT."

London, June 5 .- An announcement which I have just seen in a Paris journal recalls some strange memories: "The Abbe Constant died yesterday." Many years ago the Abbe Constant-whose surname certainly did not betoken his character-lost his faith, broke his vows as a priest and attempted to contract marriage with a woman he had seduced. There was a civil marriage performed between the Abbe and this lady, but the courts dissolved it on the ground that the Abbehaving taken vows of celibacy as a priest, could not lawfully marry. The parties soon afterwards separated; the lady, who was known as Naomee Constant, assumed the sobriquet of Claude Vignon and besixth as Third. Other preliminaries will be arranged by the competing players present at the General Meeting. An entrance fee of $2,00 will be required from all competitors who are not members of all competitors who are not members of gan to write novels. She subsewished to discover the philosoper's stone.

In his investigations into the transmuta-tion of metals he is said to have discovered a process of making a metal of which the main ingredients are nickel and copper, but which, by the addition of certain from pure silver save by its greater light ness. I have myself visited the Abbe's rooms, and have paid him for having my fortune told. He seemed to me to be like a man who was labouring under some great fear. He could tell me nothing that had not known before, and he offered to with me ere long." A day or two after-Paris; it was Verger, the visitor of the Abbe.
