There is probably some truth in both theories, but the fact that such theories are propounded by all the organs of public opinion in the city is very strong presumptive evidence of the existence of a radical weakness. It cannot be said that we do not pay for protection, and if it is necessary to increase the force permanently, precaution will be neglected for the public that those upon whom the duty devolves of preparing for the exigency understand what is hoped and expected of them. It may be added that the idea of keepng men on duty from 7 o'clock in the norming until midnight, making seven teen hours per diem, which we believe is the regular spell, is perfectly ridiculous. The half of that is all that any ordinary mortal is able to accomplish-certainly ten hours is all that any man should be asked to do.
