

Night and Morning.

Book 111.

CHAPTER IV.

As we are now in the month of January, and the weather is so cold, I thought I would give you a little of the story of the night and morning of the 10th of January, 1876.

I would like to know what kind of a night it was for you. I have said that Gwatrey's tale made a deep impression on Philip, and that impression was increased by the conversation which followed.

It was a very long conversation, and it was not until the middle of the night that Philip went to bed. He was very tired, and he fell asleep very soon.

When he awoke in the morning, he found that he was alone in the room. He looked at his watch, and saw that it was ten o'clock.

He got up, and went to the door. He opened the door, and looked out. He saw that it was a very bright day, and that the sun was shining brightly.

He went down stairs, and found that the house was very quiet. He saw that the breakfast was laid out on the table.

He sat down at the table, and ate his breakfast. He felt very well, and he was very happy.

After breakfast, he went to the window, and looked out. He saw that the sun was still shining brightly, and that the sky was very blue.

He went to the door, and opened it. He saw that the garden was very quiet, and that the flowers were all dead.

He went to the door, and opened it. He saw that the garden was very quiet, and that the flowers were all dead.

Mary!—well, this is folly. But Fanny is all right. I am not afraid of her. I am not afraid of her. I am not afraid of her.

When you are of my age you will know why we endure what we do. Why we endure what we do. Why we endure what we do.
