CHAPTER XIII (Continued.) GUIOMAR.

Speak! What are you? RUTILLIO. Gracious woman, hear me. 1 am astranger And in that I answer all your demands.

Custom of the Country Eugenie replaced the curtain. And scarcely had she done so, ere the steps in the outer room entered the chamber where she stood. Her servant was accompanied by two officers of the police. "Pardon, madame," said one of the latter; "but we are in pursuit of a criminal. We think he must have entered this house through a window above while

"Without doubt," answered Eugenie, in the other apartments. I have not this feature quitted this room."

"You are right. Accept our apologies." And the officers turned back to examine every corner where the fugitive was not. For in that, the scouts of Justice resembled their mistress; when does man's justice look to the right place? The servant lingered to repeat the tale he had heard, the sight he had seen. When, at that instant, he saw the curtain of the alcove slightly stirred. He uttered an exclamation, sprung to the bed-his hand touched the curtain - Eugenie seized his arm. She did not speak; but as he turned his eyes to her, astonished he saw that she trembled, and that her cheek was as white as marble. " Madame," he said, hesitating, " there is some one hid in the recess.' "There is! Be silent!" A suspicion flashed across the servant's mind. The pure, the proud, the immacu late Eugenie! "There is ! - and in madame's chamber!" he faltered unconsciously. Eugenie's quick apprehensions seized the foul thought. Her eyes flashed, her cheese misoned. But her lofty and gen ions nature conquered even the in-lignant and scornful burst that rushed to her lips. The truth !- could she trust | Threscolonial Mailway. the man! A doubt-and the charge of the human life rendered to her might be betraye i. Her colour fell-tears gushed t o her eves. "I have been kind to you, Francois.

Madame confides in me, it is enough,' said the Frenchman, bowing, with a slight smile on his lips; and he drew back re-One of the police officers re-entered.

"We have done, madame, he is not here. Aha! that curtain! "It is madame's bed," said Francois. But I have looked behind." "I am most sorry to have disarranged you," said the policeman, satisfied with the answer; "but we shall have him yet." And he retired.

The last tootsteps died away, the last door of the apartments closed behind the officers, and Eugenie and her servant stood alone gazing on each other. "You may retire," said she, at last; and taking her purse from the table,she placed it in his hands.

"Madame may depend on my discre-Eugenie was alone again. Those words rang in her ear,-Eugenie de Merville dependent on the discretion of her lackey! She sunk into her chair, and, her excitement succeeded by exhaustion, leaned her face on her hands, and burst into she looked up, and the young man was kneeling at her feet. "Go-go!" she said : "I have done for you all I can. You heard-you heardmy own hireling, too! At the hazard of my own good name you are saved. Go!' "Of your good name!"-for Eugenie forgot that it was looks, not words, that had so wrung her pride-"Your good name," he repeated: and glancing round the room-the toilette, the curtain, the recess he had quitted all that bespoke that chastest sanctuary of a chaste woman, which for a stranger to enter is, as it were, to profane—her meaning broke on him. "Your good name !- your hireling! No, rose to his feet. "Not for me, that sacri fice! Your humanity shall not cost you so dear. Ho, there! I am the man you seek." And he strode to the door. swer. She sprung to him-she grasped his garments. "Hush! hush J-for mercy's sake

What would you do? Think you would l ever be happy again, if the confidence you placed in me were betrayed? Be calmbe still. I knew not what I said. soul, I say it, I am innocent-not of poverty-wretchedness-error-shame; I am innocent of crime. May Heaven bless you!" And as he reverently kissed the hand laid on his arm, there was something something so above his fortunes, that Eugenie was lost in her feelings of compassion, surprise, and something, it might be, of admiration in her wonder.
