

Night and Morning.

Book 111.

"And, oh!" he said, passionately, gazing on her with his dark, brilliant eyes, liquid with emotion. "You have made my life sweet in saying—your words ever since the first time you were ever seen. I believed I have so often missed and dreamt. Henceforth, whatever befall me, there will be some recollections that will—"

He stopped short, for a heart was too full for words, and the speech said more to him than if all the eloquence of eloquence had glowed upon his tongue.

"And who, and what are you?" she asked after a pause.

"An exile—an orphan—an outcast! I have no name!" Fowell said.

"Not yet; your servant is gone to rest; I hear him yet. Sit down—sit down. And whether would you go?"

"I know not."

"Have you no friends?"

"No home."

"And the police of Paris so vigilant!" cried Eugene, wringing her hands. "What is to be done? I shall have saved you in vain. You will be discovered! Of what do they charge you? Not robbery—no, no."

"And she too, stopped short, for she did not dare to breathe the black word—'Murder!'"

"I know not," said Morton, putting his hand to his forehead, "excepting that being friends with me, and those who befriended me—and they have killed him."

"Another time you shall tell in all!"

"Another time!" he exclaimed, eagerly—"I call; I see you again!"

Eugene blushed beneath the gaze and the voice of a man.

"Yes," she said; "yes. But I must remain silent—silent. Ah!—a happy thought!"

She sat down, wrote a hasty line, sealed and gave it to Morton.

"I take this note, as addressed to Madame Dufour; it will provide you with a safe conduct to Paris. I will find an old servant who lives with my mother, and to whom I have given a small pension. She promised to procure her a tenant—go say nothing of what has passed. I will tell her all about it; and see if she can be of service to us."

"The next time you shall tell in all!"

"I call; I see you again!"
