

Night and Morning.

CHAPTER XVI.

As she slipped gaily and lightly along the thoroughfare, the children would stare at her from their paths and whisper with respectful curiosity...

Months ago she passed through this town, when her father's money was her fortune. Mrs. Boxer had never got over her first grief to Fanny...

But suddenly Simon fell ill. His age made it probable he would die. He took to his bed—his being bedridden was a great calamity...

Mrs. Boxer sobbed, and before she had recovered, her father ordered. That day a new will was made, and the lawyer...

The good natured lawyer was moved,—"Can you not understand my dear child? Well, put on your bonnet, and come and talk to my wife."

And that was the new era in Fanny's existence. Her schooling was stopped. But now life schooled her. Necessity ripened her intellect.

Fanny, Wool and Henshaw kept a good variety of moderate prices at Pinard's.
