THE OPERA HOUSE. The Mond elssohn Quintette Club,

To all lovers of good music the visit this club is looked forward to with pleasure in this city. Now that the Beethoven Club has disbanded, the "Boston Philharmonio" has only come to this city in a very long period, it seems as if our only hope of hearing classic music, performed by competent masters, depended upon the Mende's sohn Quintette Club. Surely those who know the real merits of this been forwarded, and much of the Club are ready to admit that it would be afvery difficult matter indeed to bring together a sextette of artists more compotent to perform such music as the tent to perform such music as the programme of last evening contained, with that unanimous feeling and sympa-thetic regard in their ensemble playing, features which are characteristic of the features which are characteristic of the Club, and which has made their reputation -now of twenty-seven years standing -more secure whenever they perform before the public. A feature which the Club has adopted recently must be com-mended, inasmuch as it introduces to the general public music which, although not being a barren rock, fit only for fishermen strictly classic, is of such a nature as to dry their nets on, as is currently be to please the mixed musical audiences lieved. Then specimens of our different which generally patron'se their concerts. We allude to the excellent arrangements of operatic selections by members of the club themselves, so admirably as to make the absence of wind instruments unfelt. This is an addition which will commend itself to every one who attends the Menlelssohn Quintette Club concerts, as perhaps two thirds of a general audience are not conversant with the advanced works of the masters, but they can listen with pleasure, and appreciate warmly, the ficient in public spirit; and never until Horses, of familiar airs, which more than once in
