Clint Eastwood movie combines laughs, action, and sentiment

by Terry Dupuis
Last week I saw the latest Clint Eastwood movie at the Pen Theatre. It's not a western, but a contemporary crime film, and in some respects it is reminiscent of "Bonnie And Clyde" and "Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid". For "Thunderbolt and Lightfoot" is a rollicking crime story that combines lots of laughs, action, suspense and sentiment.

Thunderbolt and Lightfoot are two bank robbers played by Clint Eastwood and Jeff Bridges, respectively. Eastwood is the brain of a four-man outfit with a meticulously detailed plan to steal half a million dollars from a transport company. Bridges is the clown of the group, a smart aleck but inexperienced kid who is in on his first caper. George Kennedy is a seasoned safecracker named Red Leary, and Geoffrey Lewis, an innocuous little guy, is the gang's driver.

Perfect crime capers are certainly nothing new in movies, but this one has a couple of new angles to it. One interesting change is the location of the story. Instead of the customary big city background of Chicago or New York, "Thunderbolt and Lightfoot" takes place in Montana, the land of the Big Sky. The movie was filmed in and around Great Falls, Montana by Eastwood's own production company, Malpaso Productions, and the outdoors location photography is superb.

As for the acting, Eastwood is Eastwood, as usual, but I'm sure that the many fans of this most laconic of screen stars won't complain, and the film does have the novelty of being on the other side of the law in a modern-day crime story. (Eastwood played a modern-day sheriff in "Coogan's Bluff" and a super-cop in "Dirty Harry" and "Magnum Force").

Clint Eastwood fans, by the way, might be interested in knowing that there is a worthwhile book now available on the actor. It is a paperback by Stuart M. Kaminsky in the Signet Film Series, and it sells for $1.50. The book covers Eastwood's career from his early days as a Hollywood extra, recently seen in "Earthquake" and "Airport '75", delivers another of his big likeable lunkhead roles, but as Red Leary the safecracker, he is far more menacing than he's been in years. However, I think the acting honours in "Thunderbolt and Lightfoot" would have to go to Jeff Bridges, the 23-year-old son of actor Lloyd Bridges. His performance as the young robber, Lightfoot, is a skillful blending of comedy and pathos. This role earned Bridges a Best Supporting Actor nomination, and it is one of "Thunderbolt and Lightfoot's" highlights.

Clint Eastwood fans, by the way, might be interested in knowing that there is a worthwhile book now available on the actor. It is a paperback by Stuart M. Kaminsky in the Signet Film Series, and it sells for $1.50. The book covers Eastwood's career from his early days as a Hollywood extra, through his many years on the successful T.V. series Rawhide and the popular so-called "spaghetti" westerns to recent years when he established his own production company and directed films of his own as

"Play Misty For Me" and "High Plains Drifter".

The Happy Cooker Leftovers can be used very tastily

perhaps a can of mushroom soup, or some onion soup mix, for these are the happy little helpers that will assist in recycling the remains from Sunday dinner into several delicious main dishes throughout the week.

Beef and ham, slice more thinly (and therefore go farther) when they're cold and that's the easiest way to cope with yesterday's roast.

If you feel creative, you can dice the cold meat, and combine with a white sauce (seasoned with onion, mustard or horseradish if you have a leather tongue.) The resulting concoction then becomes something a la king, and goes well on toast, baking powder biscuits or hot noodles.

If you have a machine that will grind the left over meat, you can produce a zesty sandwich spread if you toss in some chopped pickles, onions and celery, glued together with salad dressing.

Or you can fashion croquettes by adding bread crumbs and egg. These can be fried or baked.
