

Couple visit Costa Rica to help abandoned children

The congregation at St. Paul's United Church was treated Sunday afternoon to a talk and slide by Margaret and Murray Tyndall, on a visit they made this summer to the town of Pueblo, Costa Rica. The two made the trip as part of the Pueblo-Canada program under which a number of Canadian volunteers are maintaining homes for abandoned children in the town. The volunteers do odd jobs connected with the project, and generally help out with such things as recreation, and short trips for the children.

The Tyndalls found out about the organization from the Reverend Norman Watson. Tyndall said "We never would have found out about it without him."

They made their application last winter, and found out it had been accepted about three months before they were due to leave. From that time on, they engaged in an intensive study of Spanish.

They enjoyed their study of the language, and Tyndall said "It's very pleasing to communicate in another language." He said their initial attempts to communicate in Spanish showed them how it must feel to be an immigrant in Canada, who does not speak English.

The Pueblo-Canada program is a five-year program. Tyndall said the idea is for the Costa Ricans to take over the program themselves four years from now. The country at present has no government programs to help children who have been abandoned by parents who are too poor to support them. Many of the abandoned children in Costa Rica now end up stealing or becoming prostitutes, and many find themselves in jail, where they are at least clothed and fed properly.

In the Pueblo-Canada project, there are 12 houses where the children are fed, clothed and looked after.

The Tyndalls showed slides of the country and of many of the children who lived in the homes. They answered questions from the audience, and explained the details of the trip.

The Tyndalls showed slides of the country and of many of the children who lived in the homes, and they answered the questions of the interested audience.
