Old Lichen partnerships - plants break rocks into soil

One of the oldest life forms of the world could be growing in your own backyard. Lichens are hundreds of years old, and are the only plants in the world that grow on bare rocks.
Partners:
It was only in 1867, that a Swiss botanist proved that a lichen (pronounced like "en") is not just one single plant. Each lichen species is two plants living together. They are part fungus and part alga. Most of the lichen body is the fungal part, with the algal part distributed just under the surface. The fungus obtains food and moisture from the alga. The alga in turn, is protected by the fungus covering and receives minerals that the fungus absorbs from bark or stone.
Pioneer Plants:
Lichens help to convert the bare rocks, on which they grow, into soil. Acids from the lichens dissolve the minerals of solid rock and cause small cracks in the rock. Mineral soil is built up in these clefts allowing mosses to grow. Dead plant material from the mosses adds humus to this soil, enriching it and making it possible for herbs and eventually trees and shrubs to grow on the newly formed soil.
Thanks to the pioneering efforts of lichens, the process of soil formation is started, allowing other

For the no-fuss cooker - super good baked ham slices

"What we need," said a cooker follower last week, is some no-fuss recipes. Never mind the flambé, the sauté and all that stirring and pot-watching. Give me something that will cook peacefully while I drive the kids to their music lesson."

She's right. There are times when one wants to cook supper, and times when one wants supper to cook itself.

For her, and for all other cooks who would rather read a book or play Monotony with the kids I offer the following super-simple recipe for a baked ham slice. I used slices which were a little less than an inch thick. The result was super-good and even made a hit with the resident picker who normally dislikes ham because it's so salty.

Baked ham slice
Four or five ham slices - 1/2 - 1 inch thick
1/4 cup brown sugar
1 teaspoon dry mustard
Milk to cover. (I used reconstituted skim milk powder.)

Place ham in a casserole or baking dish big enough so that none of the slices overlaps. Rub each slice with mustard, and sprinkle with sugar. Then pour milk into the pan - just enough to cover the slices.

Cover, and bake in a moderate (350 degrees) oven for an hour, or until tender. And it is - very. If your baking pan doesn't have a lid, improvise. I found that a cookie sheet fit over mine nicely.

While you have the oven on, put together this Rice Pilaf which cooks at the same temperature for the same time.

1 cup uncooked long grain rice
1 tablespoon instant minced onion
1/2 teaspoon salt
1/4-1/2 teaspoon ground thyme or poultry seasoning

1/4 cup chopped green pepper, if you like it.
1/2 cup drained mushroom stems and pieces
1 tablespoon margarine or butter
2 chicken bouillon cubes (or 2 teaspoons instant chicken bouillon)
2 cups hot water.

Combine all ingredients in a one quart baking dish. Cover, and bake at 350 degrees for about an hour stirring occasionally, until the rice is tender and bubbly.

Put a salad together at the last minute with half a head of lettuce plus one cup of drained mandarin oranges, and dinner's ready. (You can get the kids to tear up the lettuce instead of fighting.)

Boaters must use prescribed containers transporting gasoline

Only four types of portable containers can be filled by attendants at gas outlets, the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations announced this week. The new regulations, enacted at the beginning of this year, make it illegal to use any but the prescribed portable containers for transporting gasoline.

The four types of containers which may be filled at Ontario gasoline outlets are:
- plastic containers of metal or plastic, one gallon to five gallons in size. These containers must bear the label of ULC (Underwriters' Laboratories of Canada) or CSA (Canadian Standards' Association). They must also be in reasonable condition and have all necessary caps in place.
- portable fuel tanks for marine use. These may be metal or plastic and may contain up to seven gallons. Those sold after Aug. 1, 1975 will bear a ULC or CSA label. Those sold before that date have no such label.

- Transportation containers. These are metal drums, 10-45 gallons in size bearing an embossed mark in the metal on the bottom of the can. The mark may be ICC-5L, DOT-5L, BTC5L or CTC-5L.
- Metal jerry cans. These are World War II style cans which are marked in the same code as the metal drums. They must be in reasonable condition and have the required gasket and closure in place.
The regulations were put into effect after a number of accidents were reported across Canada by individuals using non-CSA or ULC certified containers. The container in general use was a red-painted metal can with yellow markings which was originally intended for syrup and was not designed to prevent the escape of gasoline in liquid or vapor form. Containers not bearing ULC or CSA labels should not be used to store or transport gasoline.

Wraith's grand slam leads Smith's to 27-6 win

Cam Wraith blasted a grand slam home run and earned seven RBI's to lead Smith's Mobile Homes to a 27-6 victory over French Dry Cleaners in house league baseball action last week.
Pitcher Kirk Wright was awarded the win.
In other action the Blue Jay's downed Twin Lakes Sports 18-10. Steve Finney hit a home run for the Jay's.

Avco defeats Royal Bank 19-4

Jim Forbes did the power hitting and teammate Andy Duckworth was tough on defence as Avco defeated Royal Bank 19-4 in house league baseball action last week.
Forbes belted in three home runs for Avco. Rory Smith, Larry Murphy and Eddy Moreau all hit single home runs. Winning pitcher Duckworth was deadly on the mound, striking out 11 batters and allowing the unusually low number of runs.

Dave Elrick and S. Finley provided the only highlights for the Royal Bank squad as they each belted in home runs.
