And then my poor meatball rolled under a bush

A second trial-run to test the feasibility of using meat balls to carry an oral rabies vaccine for wildlife began this week, Ontario Natural Resources Minister James Auld announced.

In a test last March, the ministry distributed 20,000 tetracycline-treated meat balls by aircraft into Huron County bush areas.

"A total of 40,000 meat balls contained in small plastic bags, are being dropped this month over Wingham and Owen Sound areas to test this type of distribution," Mr. Auld said.

"Hamburger meat balls, readily devoured by foxes and skunks, the province's main rabies carriers, are believed to be the most effective method of eventually administering the vaccine," the Minister added.

Ministry research scientist Dennis Voigt says that in 1981 the meat balls may carry doses of the vaccine which is presently being developed. For trial purposes, they now contain only small quantities of a marking agent, tetracycline, more commonly known as an antibiotic. Teeth of bait-eating foxes and skunks will show golden yellow fluorescent lines under an ultra-violet microscope.

Local hunters and trappers assist the program by turning over captured foxes and skunks to the rabies unit of the ministry's wildlife research station at Maple, Ontario.

Voigt says results of trials held last fall showed that 74 per cent of the foxes and 56 per cent of the skunks captured had taken the bait.
