

Here's way to help land that important job

Planning on keeping your summer job? Well here are some pointers to make it a good summer for all concerned.

Showing up on time the first day would be a good way to start. If you're not sure of the starting time go and find out. They won't mind you asking, after all they hired you to work.

Dress accordingly! The employer will probably tell you what is appropriate. If working for a construction company, long pants and work boots are the order of the day. If steel toed boots are necessary get them. Nothing would annoy an employer more than sending you home to change clothes. Remember first impressions are lasting. For most office jobs dress pants would do.

Now that you are at work they'll probably show you the ropes. If they demonstrate something to you and you don't understand ask they'll be glad to explain rather than have you break something or hurt yourself.

So you're working hard and then the whistle goes for your lunch. On the first day this can be a task in its self. Most of the people you'll be working with are older but I'll bet they don't bite! It can be a pretty lonely summer unless you talk to your fellow workers. The easiest way to start is by saying "Hi". I'm sure they'll reply with something similar.

In the afternoon a problem or question arises, don't hold up everyone else, but when the chance comes up go and try to get it resolved. If you keep it bottled up it will make it a hard summer.

So it's almost quitting time. Stay busy, it will help the time fly by and you're being paid to work until the final whistle goes.

When it's time to go home leave the job at the office and go. Bringing its problems home won't lead to solving them, only ulcers. Get a good nights sleep before the next day.

This plan isn't always foolproof but most of the time will lead to an enjoyable summer.

Employment on their minds

Wendy Cadeau of Midland, left, is interested in working this summer and would like a job in babysitting or recreation, being very interested in sports and track and field. Heather Bonang of Elmvale, far right, is also looking for work and would like a position in an office, a store or in the clothing business. She is also interested in sports and track and field and can type 32 words per minute. Center is Bonnie Curry of Student Employment in Midland

Consumer minister co-ordinates program urges public to register complaints

Federal Consumer and Corporate Affairs Minister Andre Ouellet announces government initiatives in respect to problems associated with the recently banned urea formaldehyde foamed in place insulation (UFFI).

The insulation material was banned in December 1980 under the Hazardous Products Act because it was deemed an unstable material that could break down and release formaldehyde gas which can produce adverse health effects.

As a first step, the Minister is establishing an information/coordination (UFFI) centre, expected to be fully operational by the end of this month for members of the public to register their complaints and solicit information.

An across Canada toll-free line will be available. The location of the centre and telephone numbers will be published shortly.

Mr. Ouellet is also encouraging owners of houses and buildings that are used for rental purposes to investigate whether or not a problem exists in their buildings.

The Department of Public Works will be doing likewise for buildings occupied by employees and tenants of the federal government.

The National Research Council's booklet, Building Practice Note on Urea Formaldehyde Foam Insulation is available to the public and can be requested by calling CONTACT.

A technical paper on Urea Formaldehyde Foamed in Place Insulation (UFFI) will be available shortly.

Mr. Ouellet says government will decide on any further action once the results of the national testing survey, the recommendations of the Board of Review and the findings of the co-ordination centre are available.

He concludes his statement by saying that he will be looking to provincial governments and industry for their fullest co-operation.
