No more patches required by Ont. hunters

Because of the new provincial legislation concerning trespass on private property, no regulations requiring hunters of small game to wear back patches are being proposed for 1982, Ontario Natural Resources Minister Alan Pope announced.

The system of requiring small game hunters to wear numbered back patches corresponding with their licence numbers, was introduced in the early 1960s to assist land-owners in southern Ontario to identify persons (who were not wanted on their land-s).

The Game and Fish Act required all small game hunters throughout the province, even on Crown lands, to wear these numbers. This statutory requirement on Crown lands in Northern Ontario was felt to be unnecessary and The Game and Fish Act was amended to allow the government to designate the areas in which such badges would be required.

"Following a review of the areas where the requirement should be imposed, we have decided to discontinue this system, since the new Trespass to Property Act tightens up the enforcement of trespass law to protect the land-owner," Mr. Pope said.

He said there have been few prosecutions under The Game and Fish Act to do with trespass, and very few reports from land-owners.

"The respect for land and land-owners is being enhanced through the mandatory hunter education program, and through the hunter examination system," the Minister said.
