Clerks, engineers RAP about algae population

Local municipal clerks were members of the group briefed about the Severn Sound Remedial Action Plan (RAP) on Monday.

The Severn Sound is one of 17 areas in the Great Lakes identified as a problem by the Canada-United States International Joint Commission. RAP is the means to solve the problem.

Algae is the problem with the local water, clerks, engineering staff and planners, and politicians from the nine municipalities which have either shoreline on, or streams which drain into, Severn Sound, were told.

The meeting at the Wye Marsh Wildlife Centre is the first in a series of meetings and appearances by the Severn Sound RAP team. The RAP members are drawn from the Ministry of Natural Resources and the Ministry of the Environment, and from Environment Canada.

The RAP team's schedule calls for a plan to be produced by mid-1990.

The water flowing into Severn Sound is being measured and analyzed. Phosphorous is the main booster for the too-abundant algae. Samples of water from the water already in southwest Georgian Bay are being taken too.

Monitoring of the major water courses that empty into Severn Sound has begun. The amount of nutrient from each, and the rate of flow from each of, Copeland Creek, Wye River, Hog Creek, Sturgeon River, Coldwater River, North River, and Severn River, is being measured.

The decline in the walleye population is the other anomaly under investigation.

The walleye are being replaced by black crappie, a fish which eats the water fleas which eat algae.

Algae is thickest in Penetanguishene Bay. A nuisance for many years, the algae affects swimmers and people who want to enjoy the water in other ways.

The RAP team will be represented at public gatherings this summer, such as the Midland Sidewalk Sale. RAP team members are interested in being invited to address public interest groups. The team wants to inform as many different sectors of the public as possible, RAP team co-ordinator Keith Sherman said.

Representatives of Simcoe County and the District of Muskoka were invited as well to the municipal information workshop.

Fax line used by police to ID man

One of the marvels of modern technology enabled the Midland Police Force last week to lay charges against a man who refused to reveal his identity.

A telephone fax machine, which can transmit documents and pictures across a phone line, was used to send a fingerprint from a Toronto police station to the local unit.

With that in hand, the local police proceeded with charges of impaired driving, refusal to provide a breath sample, obstructing justice and driving while under suspension against 49-year-old Dillan David Servais of Toronto.

His first court date was scheduled for June 20. He was denied bail at a hearing last Wednesday.

Police say the incident began when they noticed a grey Chrysler weaving from lane to lane southbound on King Street at 11:10 p.m. last Tuesday. The car was pulled over at the intersection of King Street and Colborne Street after it ran a red light, according to the police.

Police say the driver refused to give his name or submit to a breath analyzer test.

found floating near his boat south of Honey Harbour on Sunday.

The drifting boat was found in the main channel off Moore's Point.

Whether an inquest will be held had not been decided on Monday. Police believe Cobb fell into the water from his boat and drowned. He was not wearing a life preserver.
